Now let this matter be plainly understood. Who are these who prefer black to whites? Who are those who consistently say that they are not at last fighting to maintain the place of the black race in the Union? Are they the Democrats with their party allies at the North, insisted that they would bring black men into the free States and carry them into the Territories to be protected by the Government. These black men, both in the free Territories, would be slaves, of course have been the direct rivals of the white laborers There saw the danger, and said at the polls: "No, we may have white men in our new free States, but you shall not bring these into ours, nor into the common territory." The leaders answered: "We will either to what we choose in this matter, and we choose to carry our black men every where, and to protect them by the Government as well as to destroy the Government. Why? Because the people, who are the Government, insist that we shall not bring the black men into all the States and Territories. Who, then, are to be justly called the fighters for the rivalry of black labor with white, if not those who, to secure and establish that rivalry, have taken up arms against us?

The people of this country, not moved by any profound moral conviction but by a perception of interest, were resolved to keep the Territories free from black slave labor. The rebels were resolved to take it into them, and the fighting became what were lawfully prevented. Which is fighting for the black labor against the white? There is no necessary conflict. But slavery creates an antagonism, because it disgraces labor and degrades it laborer. Which, then, is the party of the working man, that which tries to keep away the competition of slave labor, or that which tries to establish it? Let every working man answer.

BRITISH FAUTUTY.

It is instructive to observe from time to time the progress made by that apt scholar, John Bull, in sympathy with a rebellion that rises to slave the futility of a popular system and to establish the supremacy of a monarchy. Not long since Lord John Russell informed us that it was a very far-seeing man the part of the United States Government—a remark as sensible as to say when a man is hung in London for murder, after due conviction, that the Government of England is trying to show its authority. Mr. Gladstone lately intimated that Jefferson Davis created an army and navy, and has developed a nation. Now comes the compliment from an English minister.

Meanwhile Mr. Bernard, with his remarkable little book, "Thirteen Months in the Rebel Army," tells us that the rebels declare that they have invented a hundred thousand pound of arms from abroad, chiefly from England and France. The latter arrived from England, via Nassau, exhibit the cruces-marks involved. "I have seen Enfield rifles of the manufacture of 1861 and 1862 with the stamp of the Tower on the barrels." The fact that "England's neutrality" is a joke among the rebels is clear. But it is a joke they enjoy with the rest of the world.

The most amusing illustration of the realist policy of Lord John, and of the rebel quality is a late comment in some commercial paper upon the present attitude of the rebels. It is arguing the necessity of recognition, and the most convenient it would afford. Mr. A. H. Stephens, the rebel Vice-President, in the inaugural principles of the new Government, said, two years ago, that there might be no misunderstanding what the Union meant "The Federal Government is the first in the history of the world based upon this great physical, philosophical, and moral truth (of Slavery). But the paper is not appalled, and exclaims, with virtuous approbation, that the origin of the new nation is already known to exist, that so far they have earned it, they already have the moral encouragement of the sympathy of every free people."

Not the least curious incident of the time is the open renunciation by every party in England's organs of opinion of the position of Great Britain as the traditional friend and defender of Liberty.

A NEW ORATOR.

THE popular lecture system, or Lyceum, is peculiar to us. It has become almost a feature in the great European Universities, and single library and scientific institutions of England and Scotland. Institutions and el-sewhere in England; but the regular winter series of popular lectures upon any subject of general interest is American invention. The tendency of the lecture with us is to the discussion of abstract social or moral or political principles; but whatever is human games is improbable, and the charm of such topics unstable. In fact, there are few popular lecture subjects the only proper ones for miscellaneous lectures, and they will be glad to hear of the revival of a great lecturer in the old time. The London papers say of him he tries, will make our men lecture orators legal, to their hearts.

Mr. T. Mexon Jones, late of Trinity College, Dublin, is by birth an Irishman, and—as all true Irishmen ought to be—is of Celtic blood of Gaelic and its Government, and not of the conspiracy to ruin both. He has delivered in London "orations upon various literary topics which are praised in the most lavish manner. His subjects are drawn from the Irish and native history, Celtic, Curran and the wits of the Irish bar; Denis Scott and his critics; Grattan and the Irish orators; Irish Parliament, Lawyers, Irish Wits, Irish Melodists; Daniel O'Connell and Irish agitation; Thomas Moore and Irish poets; Lord Macaulay; and the American Rebellion. Hen, surely, is a fascinating list. Of the orator's quiet fixation the London Daily News says: "He combines all the careful elaboration of a practiced reader with the ease and nature of a spontaneous speech. . . . He is a real orator." The Daily News says: "The great thing which will strike the hearers of Mr. Jones's lectures will be his manner. In Mr. Jones is the spontaneity and ease of his diction, which, marked as it is by an impassioned earnestness and fervor, is yet so thoroughly united with the conversational assurance of one most distinguished in society, that it is rapidly onward, unbroken by the slightest hesitation." All the papers unite to his remarkable oratorical gifts.

Mr. Jones comes to the country well recommended. He has here a fresh arena—but he will find it a hard one. The Lyceum Bureau, Irish Room and fair play, then, for the new-comer. It is a field in which a man can maintain himself on his own power and ability. We understand Mr. Jones to ask only the fair field, relying upon himself to win the fullest favor.

A LITTLE COMMON-SENSE.

"But at any rate the black man will come North when the free! I" is the cry of those who are stood by every administration who is driven from every other position. But why will they?

Suppose, friend, you live upon an island. Suppose that by the law of the island you must work hard all your life, and your children indentured after you, without pay, for the most wretched food and shelter, and all for the profit of a man who has no more right to make you work for him than you to make him work for you. Suppose that he lived in a house by the water, and that you owned a raft. Suppose a man to marry whom he chooses for you; sells your children to pay his own debts; and chases you with blood-hounds when you try to escape. What are you all likely to do? Why, you will go from place to place and starve through hunger and thirst, by blood-hounds and hell-hounds, to escape. You will submit to being boxed up; to stills in the holds of ships; to endure every chance and all suffering to escape; to endure every thing you were born there; leave that island. Though you were born there; though the climate is sweet to you; though you love the land where you have been inhabited, you will still fly if you can, and every generous soul in the world will exclaim, God help you!

But suppose that upon that island you have plenty of well-paid work and ample room and verge for you; suppose that you are your own master and the father of a family, does it seem so strange that you are against your will; suppose that by industry and thrift you may, if you will, become a proprietor, or, if you are the civil equal of every other man; suppose that you love the island as your native soil—its climate is sweet to you; and there are no negroes on it there. Is that a place from which you are always plotting to escape or hopelessly pining in despair because you can not get away? Or is it a place to which all of your race and kindred instinctively turn as the final home and resting place? Do you need blood-hounds and whipping-posts, manacles and the stake, to keep you there and to repel your kind? No; you stay there, self-respecting; industrious, and content.

The Proclamation works that miracle. Why should the blacks run from here if the very moment that all reason for coming is removed? They come here to be free, but there is freedom in the North. Make them free at home, and they will think you with all their hearts and stay there. Keep them slaves, and of course they will take advantage of the war and run wherever they can.

IMPATIENCE.

WHILE there is a natural impatience at the delay of our final victory over the rebellion, and an eager urging forward of the army all along the line, let us not forget the splendid progress already ordered by that army. The details of plans and general movements are necessarily kept from the public of responsibility so unsettled, that no one ought to speak too decidedly of either. But the one paramount, unquestioned fact is, that the men, fresh from their pursuits of perfect peace, have fought most bravely, and driven the rebels from all but that they were handled by an intelligent general. Think of their last great movement. They fell back upon Mc'Clellan when the Rappahannock under Pope through Eastern Virginia. Nothing demoralizes an army so surely and rapidly as a general retreat. But through all that long movement the astounding march they fought as well as men under the circumstances could fight, that the men, thoroughly had the advantage on the Friday before Pope's final discomfiture.

Yet the retreat ended in wild confusion, almost dismay, before Washington. Military and political judgment has condemned the general movement nearly than the rebellion. The army itself was disheartened not because it was not successful, but because it could not understand why it was not so, or what it was about. But it moved promptly into Maryland. It overtook the foe. It fought the most glorious battle and won the most decisive victory of Antietam, and all this after six weeks of an experience that would have utterly destroyed it, both from moral and material causes.

It may justly say to us that our impatience may become unreasonable. It may justly say to us that we ought to remember that the rebels may venture much that we dare not to us. It may justly put us in mind us that Washington is defended at this moment in the Shenandoah Valley; and, miserable blood-shed as it is, it is still our second central point. An advance of the army, military success, is beyond all question a condition precedent to that cause. But if we go into winter-quarters along the whole line, it is not probable that we shall come out of them to be blockaded. And while the advance is necessary, it must be the pursuit of some policy of vigor. It must be in obedience to a plan which will make success such positive advantage that it must be of a character to show the country that all the means it is possessing to advance are well and wisely used. It must be an advance that will invigorate the Northern, in the same degree that it terrifies the Southern heart.

It is not the soldiers who flag. It is not they who are wearying. Let them be reinforced at every movement, in the whole scope and the least detail of policy, a great, energetic, concentrated purpose, and the army will push enough to the work for which they have taken up arms.

"I'LL TRY, SIR."

THAT slavery is the chief support of the rebellion every body knows. For in a population of eight or nine millions, if there are four millions who are not willing to work upon the plantations, five millions can send off all their fighting men to the field. That this is a practicable plan is obvious enough from general considerations. But the late editions from the South show the case in the clearest light. In Texas, and some parts of Louisiana, Virginia Valley, a conscription, or forced levy of slaves, is now in force wherever their labor is necessary for the army. And the Richmond Examiner broaches slaveholders to hire their slaves for army service, saying: "Good wages are offered, and patriotism and attention will be given every negro hired for the army, and the slaveholder ought to remember that for every negro he has furnished he puts a soldier in the ranks."

Now a commander-in-chief of an army and navy who knows that fact and does not try to turn it to his own profit and the advantage of his cause is either a fool or a knave. To say that he can't do it, by telling the substitutes that if they will come he will keep them by force, and that if they refuse to "put a soldier in the ranks" he will protect them as fast as he can, is to beg the question. He can try. If he does not try, he is incompetent.

Our commander-in-chief has undertaken to try. If confidence has been misplaced, if Napoleon had said, "Pooh! I can't take an army and cannon over the Alps," and had folded his arms, there would have been no Marengo. If Captain Miller, ordered to take a battery, had said—"Dear me, Sir, I haven't the means"—he would have heard of his answer only to laugh at it. But when he replied, "I'll try, Sir," he spoke not only like a soldier, but a man. There are those who insist that the Proclamation, which is a mere military order, is futile or worse. Very well. Happily nothing turns on it. We can try, gentlemen, we will try.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"ALWAYS buy your chestnuts blind," said Mr. Snow to Alhambra, the other day, as they were going in that fifth broom commodity. "'Cause the raw ones want looking after, and the worm-eaten ones don't want looking after, and the blind ones don't make no difference—worms can't see when they're in 'em."

"You want a flogging; that's what you do," said a parent to his unruly son. "I know it, dad, but I'll try to get along without it."

Who was Sickle's wife? Mississippi, of course.

"There's nothing like leather" is an old saying and a true one. It is the sole support of man.

It has been ascertained that the "man who held on to his hat" was a shoplifter.

A darkey's instructions for putting on a coat were, "Put de right arm, den de left, and den gib one general convulsion."

NORAH'S REMONSTRANCE.

Now, Terence, have done wid yer teasing,
Do let me alone, I intrate;
It's the skin from me fingers ye're squating;
Sure it's hard they're to hold or to sew!

I'm worried to death wid yer prating,
And frighten'd clane out of me life;
So pray now, like a dacent boy,
You'll ever catch me for a wife.

What's a pa-ny-no?—but I'm joking!
That ye won't budge an inch from me side?
Indade, now, ye're mighty provoking,
And I don't know which way to decide.

I'm just like a bird that the snake
Is trying to draw into his mouth;
Or, turning me head, I'll be aiqual
To shutting me lips, I declare!

Leave off, Sir! How dare ye to do it!
Ah! I ought—but I'll not—I'll not say!
I'd better (sich mind me, ye'd run it!)
Than ye should say I'm cruel to the boy.

Don't think it's for love I'm conceiving—
Ye've nothing at all to recommend you—
But only in hopes of preventing Myself from becoming an old maid.

As two gentlemen were discussing the merits of a peppercaster, one of them remarked, "He always prefers his wife to a pepper-caster, because she is a relish."

"Where?" asked the other, looking around. "She had heard of him, and thought it highly complimentary to be told that she resembled a fish in any manner.

An eating-house keeper, who kept a "Rest-your-Aunt," as the French call a cook-shop, and who prided himself on his attention to his customers, was heard by a friend wishing to give the public the full benefit of his knowledge, to recommend a dish of "Fricassee Chicken—they can't be beat." In an evil hour, however, a visitor to the establishment found a feather in the identical letter of the last word. The announcement then was—"Try Shicken—they can't be beat."

Fourteen lived to be nearly a hundred years old. A lady, of nearly the same age, said to him one day in a company of friends, "Mr. Fourteen, I have to long that I have a notion Death has forgotten us." "Speak no for us you old fool," whispered Fourteen, in a manner heard by all.

"Why, Ann?" said a lady to her Hibernian assistant, "you have put hot water on the tea; it has not boiled yet." "Och, Sir, mum, it was boiled in the kettle before I put it on the table at breakfast, an' I saved the walker a purpose for the tay this afternoon."

Tom Moore is the author of the following gushing little epigram, which has been credited to a dozen others:

"They say thine eyes, my sweet Sylvia,
Have set many a heart on fire;
I see no sunshine in them, for
They never melt mine, they say."

"What do you propose to take for your colt?" said a lady to a starving gentleman. "Oh, I'll sell it very cheap; I only want the price at all."

An Irishman was brought up before a magistrate for the first offence in a charge of vagrancy, and was then questioned.

"What trade are you?"

"Sure, now, your Honor, I'm a sailor."

"Well, I'll give you a month. I question whether you have been ever to sea in your life."

"Faith, Sir, I've been at sea many a time, I came over from Ireland in a waggin'."

"Commit him to the House of Correction!"

A woman's tears are generally more effective than her words. In such cases, wind is a less powerful element than water.

That was a stentian woman, the widow of the storekeeper at Andersonch, whom his successor in office was obliged to marry, as she was too fat to be got out of the building either by door or window.

When may a man be said to be "dressed in borrowed plumes?"—When he has tarred and feathered.

"Can't charge a dollar bill, eh? Well, I'm glad of that. I've had thirty-six drinks on it in three days, and it is most good a deal of that sort for me!"

AN EXPLANATION.—A boarder was seen to pick something out of a dish before him, saying, "What is this?" asked a boarder, sitting opposite. "A little piece of bark, Sir, accidentally left on the pig." "Accident, it's my opinion you'd better not have any longer, or you might find a great pretty soon."

An advertising chandler at Liverpool modestly says, that, "without intending any disparagement to the sun, he may confidently assert that his tallow-candles are the best lights ever invented."

"I am surprised, my dear, that I have never seen you blush," said Mrs. Partington to Ann Eliza, after a long speech.

"A poor man once came to a miser and said, 'I have a favor to ask.'" "So have I," said the miser; "grant mine first." "Agreed," said the pauper, "what is it?" "Why, that you rule me for nothing."

"Caught in her own net," as the man said when he saw one of the fair sex hooked in her crinoline.

"Although you count yourself a brighter fellow than I am, yet I can come round you," as the earth said to the sun.

Praise is the handmaid of virtue, but the maid is much oftener wooed than the mistress.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

OUR ARMY IN VIRGINIA.

THE Army of the Potomac continues to advance into Virginia. On the 6th a cavalry fight was had near Lovettsville. At 11 A.M. on that day General Hunsdon came up with the rebel rear-guard, which was posted at Lovettsville, and engaged them. The fight was conducted wholly by artillery, and lasted for three hours, when the rebels were driven from the town, a small force three miles beyond. Our loss in this affair was but one man killed and fourteen wounded. On the 7th our cavalry, under General Pleasonton, had his attack at Union, and being soon afterward reinforced by a brigade of infantry, drove the rebels the rebels again fall back, and our forces occupied Union. Another portion of our army crossed the Potomac at Berlin and Geo on the 8th.

THE ADVANCE TO SNICKER'S GAP.

Official dispatches from General Mayer recount the results of our advance upon Snicker's Gap. General Gregg's attack arrived at the Gap it was held by the enemy's cavalry, who were soon driven by the fire of our artillery to the top of the mountain. Our troops then occupied the mountain this strong position, but were soon after driven back by the fire of rebel artillery posted on the hills in the rear. Sumner, on Sd, General Sharpe says that General McClellan was in full possession of the Gap. The rebel forces of Generals Jackson and Hill are reported to be in the opposite valley.

Meantime General Pleasanton has been pushing his reconnoissances well with much effect. After the artillery firing cannot between him and Stuart in front of Philomont, on Monday last, the rebels came out into an open orchard and fired from behind the trees. They were finally driven from this cover, losing one killed and ten wounded. Immediately after the occupation of Philomont General Pleasanton sent a reconnoissance by the Pennsylvania cavalry, under Major Keenan, down the road leading to Upperville. When they approached the woods, about a mile distant, artillery opened upon them. The rebels were found in force, and Keenan fell back to the hill on which the town is situated. The position of Lieutenant Fanning—a battery was brought up on the hill near the town and returned the enemy's fire with effect. Our cavalry engaged their skirmishers, and after a fight of about an hour and a half drove them from their position. General M'Clellan and his staff got a splendid view of the fight from the steeple of the town.

SKIRMISHES AT WARRENTON.

A dispatch dated Catlett's, November 2, says: "General Sickles, with Patterson's Brigade, has driven the rebels from Warrenton, and is now in possession of the town, and will probably encamp there. Warrenton Junction is also in our possession, with a large force of infantry and supporting distance, and our cavalry also hold Bealeton and Rappahannock Station. The rebels are now behind the front of General Sigel's advance. Our troops now hold all the gaps in the mountains."

NEW ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The reorganization of the Philadelphia Press writes from Harper's Ferry, under date of October 30: "The Army of the Potomac will be divided into three grand corps, each nine corps, thirty divisions, seventy brigades. The first grand army corps of the corps d'armée will be under General Reynolds (late Hooker), Fitz-John Porter, and Gen. B. Franklin. The second corps d'armée will be under Major-General Joseph Hooker. The second army will consist of the two corps d'armée of Major-General Sumner, O. O. Wilcox (late Burnside), Sturgis (late Porter), and Major-General Heintzelman. Major-General Ambrose Everett Burnside. The third grand army will consist of the corps d'armée of Major-General Sigel and two others now organized, and to whom permanent commanders have not been assigned by the President. This army will be commanded by senior Major-General Fitz-John Porter."

THE REBEL ARMY.

The rebel army of the Potomac is composed of two grand armies, under Lieutenant-Generals Jackson and Longstreet, each of four corps d'army. Each corps has brigade each, with artillery. The rebel cavalry are formed into a brigade, commanded by General Stuart, who makes any detail for, or executes any order from, General Lee, and is under the control of the Commander-in-General, this cavalry being an independent organization.

THE STATE ELECTIONS.

The State election was held in this State on Tuesday, the first time since the time for receipt of returns. The Hon. Horatio Seymour (Democrat) has carried the State by a majority of about 10,000. The Legislature is Democratic in both branches. In the city Seymour has a majority of about 25,000. Governor Sprague, the Republican, has, for one year, upon to 45,000 votes. The Democrats have elected all their candidates for Congress in the 8 counties. Among others, the following members have been elected:

District	Name.	Politics.
1	Henry C. Baldwin	Democrat.
2	Martin Kalbfleisch	Democrat.
3	Erastus Brooks	Democrat.
4	Benjamin Wood	Democrat.
5	Fernando Wood	Democrat.
6	Elijah Ward	Democrat.
7	John W. Chanler	Democrat.
8	Daniel E. Sickles	Democrat.
9	Aaron Harrick	Democrat.
10	Wm. Irving	Democrat.
11	Charles H. Winfield	Democrat.
12	Homer A. Nelson	Democrat.
13	John B. Steele	Democrat.
14	Lyndon Corbin	Democrat.
15	John A. Griswold	Democrat.
16	Calvin T. Hulburd	Republican.
17	Francis Kernan	Democrat.
18	Giles W. Hotchkiss	Republican.
19	Freeman Clark	Republican.

The returns from the State are very meagre and inconclusive. At the last hour from Syracuse, Onondaga County, we have 6,000, with a large number of Republican votes to come from the rural towns. The election passed off very quietly in the city and throughout the State.

OTHER STATE ELECTIONS.

We have not yet to return from Illinois. From Massachusetts we learn that Governor Andrew is reported elected by a large majority over Devens (Perger's Union). In Jersey it is estimated that the Democratic have swept the State, following the example of Ohio and Indiana.

GENERAL ROSECRANS'S COMMAND.

A new military department has been created, called the Department of the Cumberland, to which General Rosecrans has been assigned the chief command. It comprises the State of Tennessee, east of the Tennessee River, and such parts of Northern Alabama and Georgia as may be taken possession of by the forces under him. The command constitutes the Fourteenth Army corps, and that under General Buell the Twenty-first Army corps.

THE PIRATE "ALABAMA."

The pirate Alabama has been heard from once more on our coast. From intelligence received by the brig Baron de Castine at Boston, on 3d, it appears that she reported no less than seven vessels within a few weeks past, and destroyed them. Of these, the ship Manchester States released upon the masters giving bonds; one of them, the ship Tonawanda, a new eighty thousand dollar ship, the clipper ship Baron de Castine, in six thousand, payable to the President of the Confederate States after peace is established. The last appearance of the Alabama was in latitude 39° north, longitude 69° west, off the Capes of the Delaware, and directly in the track of the California steamers. The Alabama is now supposed to be cruising on the ocean in her own twenty-two vessels, nineteen of which she has destroyed in the last hundred and ten days.

AFTER THE "ALABAMA."

Orders have been issued to the Boundary Navy-yard to dispatch to sea at once three sum-of-war, of which the Sacramento is one. The others are the United States steamer Dacotah, one of the vessels of the regular navy, and the ship Cayuga, from the Brooklyn yard.

DEATH OF GENERAL MITCHELL.

General Ormsby M'Knight Mitchell, the great astronomer and military engineer, died on the 30th of October, on 50th October, of yellow fever. The disease is said to be of a malignant type.

ANGLO-REBEL CRAFT AT BERMUDA.

Notwithstanding the vigilance of our cruisers, we find that the British steamers Gladiator, Minho, and Owlside, all laden with cotton from the Confederate ports of, port at Bermuda for England. Fate signals were thrown out from the shore to the vessels to decoy the blockaders from the rebel ports that as the Minho sailed. They had the effect desired by the English expatriated and traitors with the rebels.

HOME PRIZES TAKEN.

We learn from Fort Royal that two Anglo-rebel steamers, the Gladiator and Nottingham, were taken by the Circassian, by our cruisers. The latter is valued at $500,000, and the former at $300,000. The Gladiator was from Liverpool and Nassau. The rebel steamer Manitoba was chased and driven ashore on the same line. She was destroyed by Charleston with stores for the rebels.

THE CAPTURE OF SABINE PASS.

In the New Orleans Delta of the 23d we find a brief account of the expedition which captured Sabine Pass, of which we have already received information from the rebels. The affair was a most brilliant one throughout, reflecting great credit upon the officers and men engaged in the affair. The rebels engaged were Lieutenant-Colonel Scranton, Acting-Master Crocker commanding; the gunboat Clifton, Acting-Master Amesbury; the bomb-schooner Jesse, Captain Pennington. The expedition, consisting of 1,000 men, captured one rebel steamer, and burned three buildings used as barracks and store-rooms, destroyed a large amount of commissary stores and property. It also captured four schooners, two sloops, and one steamer, besides eight or ten lighters which the rebels were burned.

WAR TO BE WAGED GUERRILLAS ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Rear-Admiral D. D. Porter has issued orders that "any vessel that may be fired on by guerrillas, or other persons, will do all damage in her power to the village from which she was attacked, in order to repress the outrageous practice of guerrilla warfare."

IMMIGRATION TO VIRGINIA.

The rebel General Wise, of Richmond, says, is in prison at Little Rock, Arkansas, and is soon to be conveyed to Richmond. A letter to the editor of the Richmond Enquirer from Albert Pike, of ranking authority. It is charged that he has been guilty of "the high crime of inciting the Indians to the second authority of insurgency; that after getting possession of the public funds he appointed his subordinates military orders," among others that the wells should be poisoned through the country where the Union forces of General Curtis were expected to pass.

NEGROES ENLISTED IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

On the 25th, Governor Stanly, the Union Governor of North Carolina, by dispatch, dispatched a communication to the rebel Governor Vance, proposing an interview, without any exchange or military prisoners, and of slight or rank between himself and Governor Vance. In the same proposition he offers to submit to the Confederate sessions he appointed by Governor Vance for a conference with the people, and to abide by the greatest state of public affairs and the aspect of the war.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE PALMERSTON CABINET OR RECONSTITUTION.

The British Cabinet has undergone a partial reconstruction to Mr. Gladstone's Newcastle theory of Scotsism extension. Lord Granville C. Leveson Gower, Earl of Sutherland, has made a speech in which he denies the right of the Southern Confederacy to independence on the ground that they "have not yet accomplished their independence." Lord Palmerston has delivered a speech during a rural tour, on a variety of subjects, home and foreign, but did not allude to the American question.

THE LIVERPOOL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

At a meeting of the council of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce the question of the recognition of the Southern Confederacy was discussed. Mr. Cropper, M.P., one of the members, had given notice of a motion on the subject. Mr. Cropper made a special speech. The Chamber should have been called to consider the propriety of recognizing the Confederate States. Mr. Cropper replied. After some conversation Mr. M'Fie intimated that he wished to recall his declaration on the subject, which remark was received with general satisfaction, several members present observing that the policy maintained by the Government hitherto was the only correct policy to be pursued under the circumstances.

FRANCE.

A CHANGE OF MINISTRY.

M. Thouvenel, Minister of Foreign Affairs, has resigned his position in the Emperor's cabinet. M. Thouvenel was regarded as a friend of England, of the Union and the Government. M. Thouvenel has been succeeded by the French Ambassador to Rome, Bourgs de l'Dyes, a friend of the cause of the United States.

PRUSSIA.

A CIRCULAR FROM MR. BERNARD.

A Berlin correspondent, writing on the 15th of October, gives the points of a very important circular from Secretary Seward, on the subject of intervention, to our Minister at the European courts. This paper, which is published in the Frankfort Gazette, states that Mr. Bernard has set at rest the fears of the Government of any foreign intervention; but that if such were tendered it would gain with a resolution not to do so. The correspondent would say "evasively" the correct and pending the war.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—A SHARP-SHOOTER ON PICKET DUTY.—[FROM A PAINTING BY W. HOMER, ESQ.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—"LITTLE MAC" MAKING HIS RECORDS.

VRAI COURAGE.

I.

"No, it is not at all remarkable, my dear. A man of Alan's make is not easily contented to stand idly by and watch others striving for fame without his having a share in the race or in the spoils."

"Oh, do you think that his motive?"

"Not altogether, perhaps; he has fine traits, fine ability—Alan's well fitted to succeed. Pity he married so early, great pity: his wife was not of the right stamp. Hand me the grapes, dear. Where's Gracie?"

"In the library with Alan; he came to borrow a book for his mother. I like that devotion of his: he thinks no woman in the world her equal."

"What all sons ought to believe faithfully."

"I wish Grace would keep some of her high-flown ideas a little in check. I am sure she is talking war with all her might to Alan, and he has been excited enough ever since he came back. Have you noticed how moody and absorbed he is?"

"That is because his mind is not fully decided. Then, too, those three months unsettled his business arrangements."

"These grapes are very fine. Charles, do you think Alan has any idea of asking us for Gracie?"

There was a slight shrug, a half anxious smile on the paternal visage as Mr. Redwood responded,

"How can I tell, my love? Stranger things have happened."

"Fancy Grace a step-mother! I should not like it at all."

"Ah, it would come home to us!" said Mr. Redwood, smiling. "No, I have no wish either to be an antiquated grand-parent quite so suddenly. Besides, Gracie would grace a fortune which Alan could not give her."

"Oh, as for that, if they loved each other—"

"The woman will out," interrupted Mr. Redwood; "all for love, without a thought of the needful lucre."

"Yes; I have not improved since my youthful days," said the wife, demurely.

It was getting dusky in the luxurious parlor; "shadows from the fitful fire-light" were already dancing on the wall. With twilight comes that dreamy lingering over the past; joys and sorrows are seen through a mellow mist of indistinctness: and so sat Mr. Redwood and his wife, quite forgetful of the present, talking of old and happy days which the wife's light allusion had recalled; forgetful, too, of the two younger people who, not far off, were quite as pleasantly employed.

The golden autumnal sunset deepening to crimson was slanting in the library windows, which, open to the ground, gave glimpses of garden paths brownly matted with fallen leaves. The faint breath of asters, purple and pink, white and yellow, came in with the freshening air. Far off, the hills now darkening, at mid-day glowed like a bouquet.

At a door of the book-cases stood Grace, her slight, small stature looking slighter and smaller for the athelete beside her, whose brown face was intent upon a book as he listened to her rapid, forceful words. Her face was full of verve, life, activity; even her delicate fingers were busy, and the dark wool with its bright border was fast being fashioned into something wearable.

"Oh, Alan," she was saying, "it makes me impatient to hear people sighing over the times! I think this a grand age, a noble era, when Good and Evil have met, like knights of old, to test the prowess of their followers. Who can doubt the final triumph? Good must win: this we all believe."

Her companion assented silently, not caring to check her flow of thought; and she went on, her whole face lighting, her proudly curved lips enunciating every word with a clearness which was musical, like the swift fall of nuts on a still day in the woods.

"If our ancestors could have been gifted with prescience, I really think they would have been glad to know that this day was coming; not for the bitter strife, nor for the bloodshed, but for the grandeur of a people rising in their might to redeem their country from treachery and error. My ancestors, you know"—and the little pride of accent did not mar the sweet smile which rose—"were of the best blood; and as I look at Rufus, I often think my brother a fit representative of a noble race. But had he shirked his duty at this time, had he not been so nobly eager for the fray with so earnest a purpose, I could hardly have hidden my scorn."

Alan glanced up quickly as if stung; unconsciously Grace netted on briskly, her eyes now on her work. There was a little tinge of sarcasm in Alan's tone as he replied,

"You then would be like the one, Grace, who, when

> "'Home they brought her warrior dead,
> She nor swooned, nor uttered cry.'"

A shadow crept over Grace's brow, which in animation had kept true time to her words.

"I don't know—it is a glorious death," she said, very gently and slowly, Alan's face changing its expression as she spoke. "I should not regret that he had chosen it; but, Alan, you remember that at last,

> "'Like summer tempest came her tears.'"

"And even now I see a glistening drop. Dear Grace, forgive me—I was cruel; but—I don't know whether you meant it or not; yet your words seem to reflect on my actions."

The glistening drop was swept instantly away.

"I know you better, Alan. I am sure you told me that you wanted to go—that you would go."

"But—"

"There must be no but in the way, Alan. Don't you know this is a recruiting station? I have induced a number of enlistments."

For all her playfulness her companion still looked serious; he began too to stride slowly up and down the room with the forgotten book in his hands. Grace looked admiringly at his strong manly frame; of all her preux chevaliers Alan was her chosen one for dauntless courage and resolve. She longed to see him still more her hero.

"You told me, Alan, that it would be no very difficult work for you to raise a regiment; and you know with what élan men would fight under the command of one so nobly fitted to lead them."

The praise was so gently offered, with such persuasiveness, that Alan could not resist it. He stopped in his walk, and faced the winning demoiselle.

"Grace, do you really think all duties subservient to this of fighting for one's country?"

"Certainly, Alan," answered the enthusiast.

"Can you imagine nothing which demands a man's life and honor quite as much?"

"Not at this time."

Alan again walked the floor, speaking as he did so.

"I am so nearly of your mind, Grace, that I can not conscientiously argue for the other side. Besides— Oh, I must go! I believe, as you say, that I can have some little influence; and certainly I owe my share of toil and hardship and danger. I long for it; God knows it is not a craven spirit which has made me hesitate."

He was roused from his moody quietude; but Grace did not quail at the fire she had evoked. More than ever she admired him. Suddenly he turned and said,

"My motherless children, Grace, who can I leave them with? My mother is too old to be burdened with the care of them, and if I die—"

Swiftly two hands grasped his in their firm but velvet touch, and an eager face looked up at him.

"Leave them with me, Alan."

"You, Grace, you?"

"Do you doubt my ability?"

"Are you willing to be a step-mother, Grace?"

"Oh, Alan!"—and the hands relaxed their hold but did not fall, for now Alan had them fast and close—"I did not mean that."

"Of course not, Gracie; but that is what it amounts to. Do not struggle so; your fingers have a way of restlessness that is not good for them—they will be hurt. Now you must listen. You have told me my duty, let me tell you yours. I want some one to bid me go forth and win fame as well as fight bravely. I want some one to be thinking of me, and praying for me while I am gone. Yes, I am just so selfish; and I want that person to be one whom I love better than any one in this world or any other."

"Hush, Alan! you forget you ever had a wife."

"Indeed not, Grace. I remember that four years I was bound to one who loved me not so much as the poodle she petted in her arms—one who, though dead, I dare to say was not a true woman. Never let her name again come between us, Grace. Silence only can heal such painful memories. Grace, are you too proud to be a poor man's wife?" Alan asked, softly, as she stood with eyes cast down and wrists still turning uneasily.

"No, Alan, nor—a step-mother, if in this way I can aid the good cause," she answered, with a half smile.

"But, Grace, is your love to be the guerdon for only my soldier career?"

"I shall be so proud, Alan, if it can be."

Only half satisfied, he drew her nearer, nearer. Nor did she shrink away timidly. The spirit of old romance and days of chivalry shone in the light of her clear eyes. His kisses fell softly on her brow, "royal with the truth," and, as in a dream, they stood silently watching the darkening garden paths, not heeding the growing chilliness of the air or the dead leaves which fluttered in at their feet.

II.

"Now, mother mine, you know all. How does it please you?" said Alan, drawing his chair close to the one where sat in rather stately uprightness an old lady, who for nobility of feature matched the one beside her. But the older voice trembled, the older eyes were dimmer, and looked farther back than forward.

"Alan, dear, you know that I love Grace, and that I long to see you happy with one so well fitted to render your home all that you wish; yet the compact does not please me."

"What compact, mother?"

"It is evident Grace wishes you to go to the war."

"Certainly; she spurs me on to what I most desire."

"Have you told her how you are situated?"

A darkening shade gathered over Alan's face as he replied, somewhat impetuously,

"Why should I? She thinks as I do—that nothing so much demands a man's life and honor as his country."

"Alan, 'they also serve who only stand and wait.'"

The storm had been brooding all the afternoon; now it broke angrily; the words came like dashing, driving rain.

"Not those of brawny muscle, and each nerve strung for action—not men born to do and dare, to lead and fight and conquer. Mother, why have you so long combated me? I have no right to refuse this second call. Had the women of the Revolution your spirit where would we have been now? Did they not urge on their sons and husbands? Look! I am a soldier, every inch of me. Military science has been my passion for years. I have influence. I can go into the ranks with twice the power of ordinary men. My example has some weight; and the cause could not be nobler. Why do you persist in opposing me?"

"Because, Alan"—and the fragile form grew more erect, the dim eye calmer, steadier than ever in its gaze upon her excited son—"because God's hand points to a different path for you. My son, listen patiently to me. Years ago you spurned my advice, and rushed on recklessly to sorrow—rushed on to that which now is hindering you at every step. Listen. Alan, my son, God blessed you with many gifts, with health, strength, and intellect. Life began for you very auspiciously, but you remember, dear, how rashly, from one imprudence to another, beginning with your loveless marriage, from one extravagance to another, you went blindly forward—not blindly either, but willfully—until you were so involved that there was but one course for you to pursue, if ever your errors were to be redeemed. Nobly you paused, and determined to begin anew; unselfishly you bowed to your burden; and, my son, you have so far retrieved the past as to convince all that your honor is above reproach. But, Alan, all is not yet accomplished; your debts are yet heavy; it will take years of hard work for you to redeem your obligations; and the penalty, though severe, is just. Willful rashness and folly led you to assume them; willful determination to do your duty must rid you of them. I know you will cry out at me, but believe me, it is your duty to stay at home and work. The principle is just as imperative as the country's need, though less heroic in the world's view."

"And what if all men and all mothers should think as you?" asked Alan, whose head was bowed between his hands.

"Each must decide for himself, Alan. The time may come, the peril be so great that I should say even to you, Go! but it has not yet; men and treasure are pouring forth. Then, Alan, your children, God gave them to you. My life is not worth much; do they not need you to guide them, to support and educate them?"

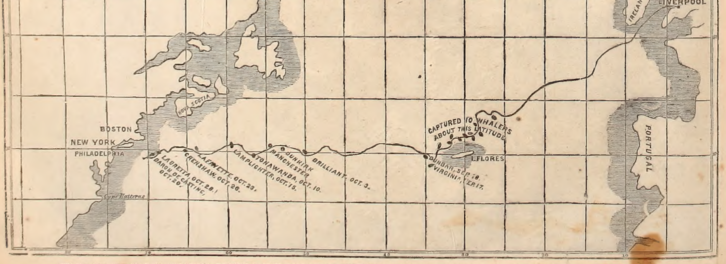

CHART OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC, SHOWING THE COURSE OF THE PIRATE "ALABAMA," AND HER STATION WHEN LAST HEARD FROM.

There was no answer, only a smothered groan. The mother's heart overflowed, tears streamed down her aged cheeks as she rose and drew Alan's head down on her shoulder.

"Alan, my boy, do not grieve; God's way is the best way always. I honor your patriotism. I share it, darling! You have forgotten that I sent your brother, who even now may be suffering or dead."

"Mother, I am a brute! I don't ask you to forgive me. I acknowledge that ambition has blinded me; my motive was not the purest patriotism."

"Hush, Alan! you do yourself injustice. I know your brave, proud spirit; but, darling, you see which way lies your path, do you not? Even today a letter from your uncle speaks of a position soon at your command, in which, with your youth and energy, you may sooner than you think be unfettered."

There was utter silence. The storm had quieted. Alan's face was stern and pale; but as he rose to leave the room he bent for a moment over the chair which his mother had again resumed. The look and gentle caress which accompanied it assured the victory.

III.

GRACE was skimming down stairs to the blithe tripping notes of "Maltreste s'en va t-en guerre" as Alan stalked in the hall the following morning; but she stopped suddenly with a vivid blush as she met his dark eyes and quiet salutation. She had involuntarily expected a little more ardor from her lover, but though there found the library unencumbered Alan still maintained his cool gravity, not so much as offering to kiss her dainty little hand, where gleamed his own seal ring, with its crest and motto of "Ai-je vrai courage rien impossible." Alan broke silence, however, at once.

"Grace, I have come to release you from yesterday's promise, to ask your pardon for my rashness."

He seemed to think a quick plunge best better than any slower procedure. Grace looked steadily and silently up at him, unprepared and incredulous, waiting for a fuller meaning of his words. His task was not easy; the very presence of the little Joan d'Arc, as he had often called her, made it hard for him to quell the aim which for months had been tightening its power.

"Reasons which have restrained me this long fled while in your persuasive presence yesterday, Grace, and I told you that which I should not to have done—a share of the perils and glories of our time is not for me, nor the guerdon which you promised; since I can not fight I must not claim the reward."

Slowly, rather bitterly he spoke. Slowly, rather coldly she replied:

"Ai-je vrai courage rien impossible," slipping off the ring as she quoted its motto. The hands fell with a tinkle on the hearth. Alan stooped to pick it up, his eyes flashing, the veins in his temples swelling. Did she mean to taunt him so? Was it not enough that he was enduring the sacrifice of his great desire without this added pain?

He was hurt, angry, and proud. Swiftly reviewing the past, as his mother had done, in few words to Grace he explained how all circumstances were with downcast eyes. Hurriedly he went on, not defending himself, not arguing his case, nor even telling her what he thought she had the right to know. Then he rose, and very gracefully, with manly earnestness and feeling, thanked Grace for her willingness to share his duties, relinquishing at the same time the cherished hope which for a few short hours had made him a happy man.

It was a dark, lowering day, and the wind was rising. The library seemed to grow darker, the air chillier. Grace shivered a little. In her eyes was an absent, dreary, disappointed expression. She was looking down still, and her hands were clasped restlessly before her. Again she murmured, "Ai-je vrai courage rien impossible." Again Alan's eyes flashed, but his voice was calm and low. Though a conqueror, he was wounded, but nothing now could make him flinch from his determination.

"What is vrai courage, Grace?"

She looked up at him. "I was thinking, Alan."

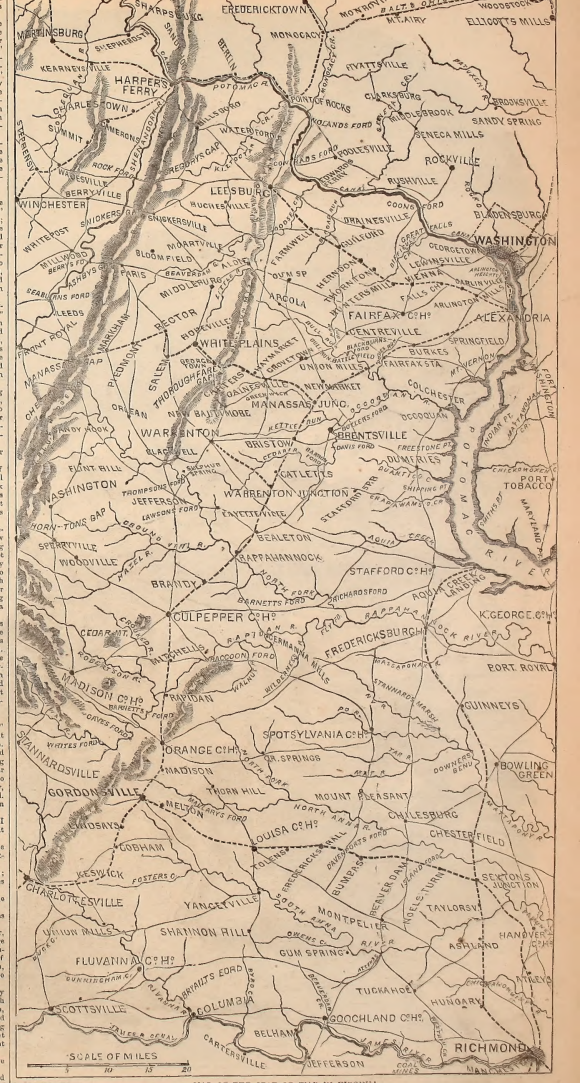
Her voice was so sweet and sad that the thought of her taunting him seemed an ignoble suspicion. Eager words were rising to his lips, but he paused as he saw the absent, pained expression fading from her eyes and a clearer light dawning under the fringed lids. She was so beautiful, and he so loved her, that for one moment he longed to say, "Grace, honor, duty, life itself is at your disposal. Command what you will, I obey;" but the man in him was, too strong, too vital for that.

"No," he thought, "I can give her up too. I have done it; the struggle is over; cost what it may, duty shall win.

Grace stood still with clasped hands, but the little fingers were no longer listless; her proud little head was poised dauntlessly as she spoke—

"Yes, Alan, I was thinking over that motto; for once the man who bears it on his shield proves it in his life."

Alan started. Had he heard aright? Was he in his sane, sober senses?



Still, with the same cross in face and speech as on the previous day, she went on—

"Courage to deny yourself fame and honor, courage to choose the humbler duty, and courage to give up what seemed to be dear to you"—blushing exquisitely and modestly as she spoke as of herself—"that is vrai courage. I honor you, Alan, for possessing it as much as I do the soldier who bleeds for our country."

Alan's voice for a moment could not find steady utterance; his stern resolve and self-denial, with the forlorn prospect of a loveless life before him, had so fixed themselves in his mind that he looked at Grace mentally as one does actually at strong sunshine after being in the dark; but her earnest admiration and glance of warm regard brought him quickly to her side.

"What, Grace, is it true? Can you, then, love me, though not your warrior hero?"

For all answer she let his arms encircle her and buried her face in his bosom.

CHAPTER III.

THERE was a pause of a few minutes, while Mrs. Lecount arranged the second of the two papers which lay before her on the table, and refreshed her memory by looking it rapidly through. This done, she once more addressed herself to Noel Vanstone, carefully lowering her voice, so as to render it inaudible to any one who might be listening in the passage outside.

"I must beg your permission, Sir," she began, "to return to the subject of your wife. I do so most unwillingly; and I promise you that what I have now to say about her shall be said for your sake and for mine, in the fewest words. What do we know of this woman, Mr. Noel—judging for her own confession when she came to us in the character of Miss Garth, and by her own acts afterward at Aldborough? We know that, if death had not snatched your father out of her reach, she was ready with her plot to rob him of the Combe-Raven money. We know that when you inherited the money in your turn, she was ready with her plot to rob you. We know how she operated, and how she failed. And we know that nothing but your death is wanted at this moment to reward her rapacity and her deception with success. We are sure of these things. We are sure that she is young, bold, and clever—that she has already become unrules, nor pity—and that she possesses the personal qualities which are in general (quite incomprehensibly to me?) are weak enough to admire. These are not fancies, Mr. Noel, but facts—to prove them as well as I know that."

He made a sign in the affirmative, and Mrs. Lecount went on:

"Keep in your mind what I have said of the past, Sir, and now look with me to the future. I hope and trust you have a long life still before you; but let us, for the moment only, suppose the case of the double-dyed villain having this will behind you, which gives your fortune to your cousin George. I am told there is an office in London in which copies of all wills are kept. Any curious stranger who chooses to pay a shilling for the privilege may enter that office, and may read any will in the list at his or her discretion. Do you see what I am coming to, Mr. Noel? Your disinherited widow pays the shilling, and reads your will. Your disinherited widow sees that the Combe-Raven money, which has gone from your father to you, goes next from you to Mr. George Bartram. What is the certain end of this discovery? The end is that you are leave to your cousin and your friend the legacy of this woman's vengeance and this woman's deceit—vengeance made more implacable, deceit made more devilish than ever by her exasperation at her own failure. What is your cousin George? He is a generous, unsuspicious man; incapable of deceit himself, and fearing no deception in others. Leave him at the mercy of your wife's unscrupulous fascinations and your wife's unfathomable cleverness! See the end as certainly as I see you sitting there! She will blind his eyes as she blinded yours; and, in spite of you, in spite of me, she will have the money!"

She stopped, and left her last words time to gain their hold on his mind. The circumstances had been stated so clearly, the conclusion from them had been so plainly drawn, that he seized her meaning without an effort, and seized it at once.

"I see!" he said, vindictively clenching his hands. "I understand, Lecount! She shan't have a farthing. Only tell me what to do—shall I leave it to the admiral?"

He considered a little. "No," he resumed; "there's the same danger in leaving it to the admiral that there is in leaving it to George."

"There is no danger, Mr. Noel, if you will take my advice."

"What is your advice?"

"Follow your own idea, Sir. Take the pen in hand again, and leave the money to Admiral Bartram."

He mechanically dipped the pen in the ink, and then hesitated.

"You shall know where I am leading you, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount, "before you sign your will. Be so kind as to give me time, to gain every inch of ground we can as we go on. I want the will to be all written out before we advance a single step beyond it. Begin your third paragraph, Mr. Noel, under the lines which leave me my legacy of five thousand pounds."

She dictated the last momentous sentence of the will (from the rough draft in her own possession), in the words—

"The whole residue of my estate, after payment of my burial expenses and my lawful debts, I give and bequeath to Rear-Admiral Arthur Everard Bartram, my executor aforesaid; to be by him applied to his own use as he may think fit."

"Signed, this third day of November, eighteen hundred and forty-seven."

"Is that all?" asked Noel Vanstone, in astonishment.

"That is enough, Sir, to bequeath your fortune to the admiral herself. Therefore, that is enough. Now let us go back to the case which we have supposed already. Your widow pays her shilling, and sees this will. There is the Combe-Raven money left to Admiral Bartram, with a declaration in the will itself that it is his, to use as he likes. When she sees this, what does she do? She sets her trap for the admiral. He is a bachelor, and he is an old man. Who is to protect him against the arts of this desperate woman? Protect him yourself, Sir, with a few more strokes of that pen which has done such wonders already. You have left him this legacy in your wife's private will, you see. Take the legacy away again in a letter—which is a dead secret between the admiral and you. Put your will and the letter under one cover, and place them in the admiral's possession, with your written directions to him to break the seal on the day of your death. Let the will say what it says now; and let the letter (which is your secret property) say the truth. Instead of leaving him your fortune, you leave it with the request that he will hand it over, after his death, to those you, and give it with the other to his nephew George. Tell him that your trust in this matter rests solely on your confidence in his honor, and on your belief in his affectionate remembrance of your father and yourself. You have known him for many years—you were born a boy. He has his little whims and oddities—but he is a gentleman from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot—and he is utterly incapable of proving false to a trust in his honor, reposed by his dead friend. Write that fairly boldly, Sir, and I will answer as this, and you save these two helpless men from your widow's power, by the surest of all means, if you letter, which privately puts the money into the hands of George."

The malicious dexterity of this combination was exactly the dexterity which Noel Vanstone was most fit to appreciate. He tried to express his approval and admiration in words. Mrs. Lecount held up her hand warningly, and closed his lips.

"Wait, Sir, before you express your opinion," she resumed, "that difficulty is all that we have conquered yet. Let us say, the admiral has made the use of your legacy which you have privately recommended him to make of it. Sooner or later, however well the secret may be kept, your widow will discover it. How is she to make that discovery? She lays siege to Mr. George. All you have done is to leave him the money by a roundabout way. Those he is, after an interval of time, as much at her mercy as if you had openly bequeathed him your will. What is the remedy for this? The remedy is to mislead her, if we can, for the second time—to set up an obstacle between her and the money, for the protection of your cousin George. Can you guess for yourself, Mr. Noel, what is the most promising obstacle we can put in her way?"

He shook his head. Mrs. Lecount smiled, and turned back into close attention by laying her hand on his arm.

"Put a Woman in her way, Sir!" she whispered, in her silliest tones. "We don't believe in that fascinating beauty of hers, whatever you may think. Our ignorant eyes can't discern such charms. Our arms don't long to be round that supple waist. We see through her smiles and her graces, and her stays and her padding—we can't fascinate us! Put a woman in her way, Mr. Noel! Not a woman in my helpless situation, who is only a servant, but a woman with the authority and the jealousy of a Wife. Make it a condition, in your letter to the admiral, that if Mr. George is a bachelor at the time of your death he shall marry within a certain time afterward, or he shall not have the legacy. Suppose he remains single, in spite of your suspicion, who is to have the money then? Put a woman in your wife's way, Sir, once more, and leave the fortune, in that case, to the married sister of your cousin George."

She paused. Noel Vanstone again attempted to express his opinion, and again Mrs. Lecount's hand extinguished him in silence.

"If you approve, Mr. Noel," she said, "I will take your approval for granted. If you object, I will meet your objection before it is out of your mouth once more. You may say—that this condition is sufficient to answer the purpose, why hide it in a private letter to the admiral? Why not openly write it down, with my cousin's name attached to it, in the will? Only for one reason, Sir. Only because the secret way is the sure way with such a woman as your wife. The more secret you can keep your intentions the more time you force her to waste in finding them out for herself. That time which she loses is time gained from her treachery by the admiral—time gained by Mr. George (if he is still a bachelor) for his undisturbed choice of a lady—time gained, by the same security, by the object of his choice, who might otherwise be the first object of your wife's suspicion and your wife's hostility. Remember how little we have discovered up stairs, and keep this desperate woman ignorant, and therefore harmless, as long as you can. There is my advice, Mr. Noel, in the fewest and plainest words. What do you say, Sir? Am I almost as clever, in my way, as your friend Mr. Bygrave? Can I, too, compire a little, when the object of my conspiracy is to assist your wishes and to assist your friends?"

Permitted the use of his tongue at last, Noel Vanstone's admiration of Mrs. Lecount expressed itself in terms precisely similar to those which he had used on a former occasion in paying his compliments to Captain Wragge. "What a head you have got!" were the grateful words he had once spoken to Mrs. Lecount's bitterest enemy. "What a head you have got!" were the grateful words which he now spoke again to the same person. So do extremes meet; and such is sometimes the all-embracing capacity of the approval of a fool!

"Allow my head, Sir, to deserve the compliment which you have paid to it," said Mrs. Lecount. "The letter to the admiral is not written yet. Your will there is a body without a soul—an Adam without an Eve—until the letter is completed and laid by its side. A little more dictation on my part, a little more writing on yours, and our work is done. Pardon me. The letter will be longer than the will; we must have larger paper than the note-paper this time."

The writing-case was searched, and some letter-paper was found in it of the size required. Mrs. Lecount resumed her dictation, and Noel Vanstone resumed his pen.

"BALSOM COTTAGE, DEWPERS, Nov. 3, 1847.

[PRIVATE.]

"DEAR ADMIRAL BARTRAM,—When you open my Will (in which you are named my sole executor) you will find that I have bequeathed the whole residue of my estate—after payment of one legacy of five thousand pounds—to yourself. It is the purpose of my letter to tell you privately what the object is for which I have left you the fortune which is now placed in your hands.

"I beg you to consider this large legacy as intended, under certain conditions, to be given by you to my cousin George. If your nephew is married at the time of my death, and if his wife is living, I request you to put him at once in possession of your legacy; accompanying it by the expression of my desire (which I am sure he will consider a sacred and binding obligation on him) that he will settle the money on his wife and on his children, if he has any. If, on the other hand, he is unmarried at the time of my death, or if he is a widower—in either of those cases, I make it a condition that you receive the legacy that he shall be married within the period of—

Mrs. Lecount laid down the Draft letter from which she had been dictating thus far, and informed Noel Vanstone by a sign that his pen might rest.

"We have come to the question of time, Sir," she observed. "How long will you give your cousin to marry, if he is single or a widower at the time of your death?"

"HE WAS DEAD!"

"Shall I give him a year?" inquired Noel Vanstone.

"If we had nothing to consider but the interests of Property," said Mrs. Lecount, "I should say a year too, Sir—especially if Mr. George should happen to be a widower. But we have your wife to consider as well as the interests of Propriety. A year of delay between your death and your cousin's marriage is a dangerously long time to leave the disposal of your fortune in suspense. Give a determined woman a year to plot and contrive in, and there is no saying what she may not do."

"Six months?" suggested Noel Vanstone.

"Six months, Sir," repeated Mrs. Lecount, "runs a little too far, I think, into the opposite extreme. Take off two or three months from the time that is too long, and add two or three months to the time that is too short. Stop! an idea comes to me. Your wife may discover that there is an interval allowed to Mr. George—but she may not also discover the time over which that interval extends. She may be obliged to guess at it. Puzzle her even there, Mr. Noel, if you possibly can! People easily guess a year—people easily guess six months. Suppose you say Eight? Eight months from the time of your death is a time not easily guessed—eight months is a strange, unlikely interval. It will baffle your wife's penetration if she is driven to guess-work: and it offers your cousin an interval to get married in which is a fair compromise between the time that is too short, and the time that is certainly too long. Take it for those two reasons—You look discomposed, Sir. What is the matter?"

"I wish you wouldn't talk so much about my death," he broke out, petulantly. "I don't like it! I hate the very sound of the word!"

Mrs. Lecount smiled resignedly and referred to her Draft.

"I see the word 'Decease' written here," she remarked. "Perhaps, Mr. Noel, you would prefer it?"

"Yes," he said; "I prefer 'Decease.' It doesn't sound so dreadful as 'Death.'"

"Let us go on with the letter, Sir."

She resumed her dictation as follows:

"——in either of those cases I make it a condition of his receiving the legacy that he shall be married within the period of Eight months from the day of my decease; that the woman he marries shall not be a widow; and that his marriage shall be a marriage by Banns, publicly celebrated in the parish church of Oxbury—where he has been known from his childhood, and where the family circumstances of his future wife are likely to be the subject of public interest and inquiry."

"This," said Mrs. Lecount, quietly looking up from the Draft, "is to protect Mr. George, Sir, in case the same trap is set for him which was successfully set for you. She will not find her false character and her false name tit quite so easily next time—no, not even with Mr. Bygrave to help her! Another dip of ink, Mr. Noel, and we write the next paragraph. Are you ready?"

"Yes."

Mrs. Lecount went on:

"If your nephew fails to comply with these conditions—that is to say, if, being either a bachelor or a widower at the time of my decease, he fails to marry in all respects as I have here instructed him to marry, within Eight calendar months from that time—it is my desire that he shall not receive the legacy or any part of it. I request you, in the case here supposed, to pass him over altogether, and to give the fortune left you in my will to his married sister, Mrs. Girdlestone."

"Having now put you in possession of my motives and intentions, I come to the next question which it is necessary to consider. If, when you open this letter, your nephew is an unmarried man, it is clearly indispensable that he should know of the conditions here imposed on him as soon, if possible, as you know of them yourself. Are you, under these circumstances, ready to communicate to him what I have here written to you? Or are you to leave him under the impression that no such private expression of my wishes as this is in existence; and to put to state all the conditions relating to his marriage as if they emanated entirely from yourself?

"If you will adopt this latter alternative you will add one more to the many obligations under which your friendship has placed me.

"I have serious reason to believe that the possession of my money, and the discovery of my peculiar arrangements in regard to it, will be objects (after my decease) of the fraud and conspiracy of an unscrupulous person. I am therefore anxious that the secret, in the first place—that no suspicion of the existence of this letter should be communicated to the mind of the person to whom I allude. And I am equally desirous — for Mrs. Girdlestone's sake, in the second place—that the person in question should be entirely ignorant that the legacy will pass into Mrs. Girdlestone's possession if your nephew is not married in the given time.

I know George's easy, pliable disposition: I dread the impression that will be made upon him, and I feel sure that the prudent course will be to abstain from trusting him with secrets, the mere revelation of which might be followed by serious and even dangerous results.

"State the conditions, therefore, to your nephew as if they were your own. Let him think they have been suggested to your mind by the new complications implied on you in the event of property, by your position in my will, and by your consequent anxiety to provide for the preservation of the family name. If these reasons are not sufficient to satisfy him there can be no objection to your referring him to me for such explanations which he may desire, to his wedding-day.

"I have done. My last wishes are now confided to you, in implicit reliance on your honor, and on your friendship for the memory of your friend. Of the miserable circumstances which compel me to write as I have written here I say nothing. You will learn of them, if my life is spared, from my own lips, for you will be the first friend whom I shall confide in my difficulty and distress. Keep this letter strictly secret, and strictly in your own possession, until my request can be complied with. I am in human being but yourself knows where it is on any pretense whatever.

"Believe me, dear Admiral Bartram,

"Affectionately yours,

"NOEL VANSTONE."

"Have you signed, Sir?" asked Mrs. Lecount. "Let me see. Yes, I see. Now, my lord, if you please we seal it up.

She read the letter carefully. In Noel Vanstone's close, cramped handwriting it filled two pages of letter paper, and ended at the top of the third page. Instead of reading a single line, Mrs. Lecount folded it neatly and securely in the old-fashioned way. She let the taper in the inkstand, and imprinted the letter to the envelope.

"Seal it, Mr. Noel," she said, "with your own hand and your own seal. Put the envelope under the paper, and handed him the pen again. "Address the letter, Sir," she proceeded, "to Admiral Bartram, Esq., Cross-in-the-Hands, Exeter." She held these words, and sign them, above the address: To be kept in your own possession, and to be opened by yourself only, on the day of my death — because, if you prefer it—Noel Vanstone. Have you done? Let me look at it again. Quite right, in every particular. Accept my congratulations, Sir. If your wife has not yet left her last glove for the Cross-Keyes yet, why it not yours fault, Mr. Noel—and not mine!"

Finding his self-control on the point of completion of the letter, Noel Vanstone reverted at once to purely personal considerations. "There is my packing up to be thought of now," he said, "and I can't go away without my warm things."

"Excuse me, Sir," suggested Mrs. Lecount, "there is the Will to be signed first; and there must be two persons found to witness your signature." She looked out of the front window, and saw the carriage waiting at the door. "The coachman will do for one of the witnesses," she said. "He is in respectable livery at Dunsdon, and he can be found if it happens to be wanted. Who must we have for the other witness, I suppose, for the other witness. They are all detestable women—but the cook is the least objectionable of the set. Send for the cook, my lord. I go out and call the coachman. When we have got our witnesses here you will please to speak to them in these words: 'I have a document here to sign, and I wish you to write your names on it as witnesses of the signature.' Nothing more, Mr. Noel. Say those few words in your usual manner; and when the signing is over I will see myself to your packing-up and your warm things."

She went to the front door and summoned the coachman to the parlor. On her return she found the cook already in the room. The cook looked mysteriously offended, and stared without intermission at Mrs. Lecount. In a minute more the two witnesses were in the room and in. He was preceded by a relishing odor of whisky—but his head was Scotch; and nothing but his odor betrayed him.

"I have a document here to sign," said Noel Vanstone, repeating his lesson; "and I wish you to write your names on it as witnesses of my signature."

The coachman looked at the will. The cook never removed her eyes from Mrs. Lecount.

"Yo'll no object, Sir," said the coachman with the national caution showing itself in every wrinkle on his face—"yo'll no object, Sir, to tell me first what the Document may be?"

Mrs. Lecount interposed before Noel Vanstone's indignation could express itself in words.

"There can be no objection, Sir, to your telling the man that this is your Will," she said.

"When he witnesses your signature to it, on as much for himself if he looks at the top of the page."

"Ay, ay," said the coachman, looking at the top of the page immediately. "His last Will and Testament, I see. Then I'll just say I saw the fronting of Death in a Document like you! Aifleish is gruss," continued the coachman, exhaling an odoriferous gust of whisky, and sitting up drivoutly at the ceiling. "Tak' thore words in remembrance from your other fronting. Many are ca'ed but few are chosen. Tak' that again in connection with Revelations, Chapter the First, verses One to Fourteen, and no whisky to hearty and what's your Waith then? Droos, Sirs! And you have my full permission to say I Cry for the potter! And your life? (Screepture once more.) The Breeth o' your Nostrils?"

The coachman sat down at the table at church; but she never removed her eyes from Mrs. Lecount.

"You had better sign, Sir. This is apparently some custom prevalent in Dumfries during the transaction of business," said Mrs. Lecount, resignedly. "The man means well, I dare say."

She added those last words in a soothing tone, for she saw that Noel Vanstone's imagination was fast merging into alarm. The coachman's manners of a gentleman, or to have inspired him with fear as well as disgust.

He dipped the pen in the ink and signed the Will without reading a word. The coachman (descending instantly from Theology to Business) wrote his signature under Noel Vanstone's pilous attention; and signed his own name as witness, with an implied commentary on the proceeding in the form of a hiccup of whisky, exhaled through the medium of a heavy sigh. The cook looked away from Mrs. Lecount with an effort—signed her name with a certain hurry, and looked back again with a start, as if she expected to find that lady transformed (in the interval) in the housekeeper's hands. "Thank you!" said Mrs. Lecount, in her friendliest manner. The cook put up her lips suspiciously—and looked at her master. "You may go!" said Noel Vanstone. The cook coughed contemptuously and went.

"We shan't keep you long," said Mrs. Lecount, cheerfully addressing the fair. "In half an hour, or less, we shall be ready for the journey back."

The coachman's austere countenance relaxed for the first time. He smiled mysteriously, and approached Mrs. Lecount on tip-toe.

"Yo'll no forget one thing, my leddy," he said, with the most ingratiating politeness. "Yo'll no forget the whusky when yo're at the table, and when ye pay me for my day's work!" He dropped this hint, and withdrew, diffusing in the atmosphere behind him, stalked out of the room.

"Lecount," said Noel Vanstone, as soon as the coachman and the cook were gone, "did I hear you tell that man we should be ready in half an hour?"

"Yes, Sir!"

"Are you blind?"

Mrs. Lecount answered with an angry stamp of his foot. Mrs. Lecount looked at him in astonishment.

"Can't you see the brute is drunk? he went on, more and more irritably. "Is my life nothing? Am I to be left at the mercy of a drunken coachman? I won't trust that man to drive me for my consideration under heaven! I'm surprised at your proposing it, Lecount!"

"He has been drinking, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount, "it is easy to see that. But he is evidently used to drinking. If he is sober enough to walk quite straight, which he certainly does, he will be sober enough for excellent handwriting, which you may see for yourself on the Will, I venture to think he is sober enough to drive us to Exeter."

"Nothing of the sort! You're a foreigner. You're prejudiced in favor of foreign people. They drink whisky from morning to night. Whisky is the strongest spirit that's made. Whisky is notorious for it. Don't tell me, Lecount. I won't run the risk. I never was a drinker, and I never will be driven, by any body else, to run one!

"Must I go back to Dumfries by myself, Sir?" said Mrs. Lecount. "Is there no help to be got in this house after what has happened to-day? I know my wits may not come back to-night! I know I never may get back to a hot a blood to lead me? Have you no feeling, Lecount? Can you do I leave you in this house alone?"

He sank into a chair and burst out crying over his own idea before he had completed the expression of it. Mrs. Lecount felt, as he said, with his handkerchief over his face—"too bad!"

It was impossible not to pity him. He was spectral wa mistable, he was the man. He had broken down at last, under the conflict of violent emotions which had shaken him from the time of the morning. The effort to follow Mrs. Lecount through the business of the day—the overwhelming which she had steadily led the way had upheld him while that effort lasted; the moment it was at an end left him helpless. He had literally broken a result—of which the coachman was free from being the cause.

"I see surprise me, you distress me, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount. "I entreat you to compose yourself. I will stay here, if you wish it, with pleasure—I will stay here to-night for your sake. You want rest and quiet after this dreadful day. The coachman shall be certainly sent away from Noel. I will give him a note to the landlord of the hotel, and the carriage shall come back for us to-morrow morning with another man to drive it."

The prospect which those words presented cheered him. He wiped his eyes, and kissed Mrs. Lecount's hand.

"Yes," he said, faintly; "send the coachman away—and you stop here. You good creature! You excellent Lecount! Send the drunken brute away and come back directly. We will be comfortable by the fire, Lecount—and have a hot little dinner—and try to make it like old times." His weak voice faltered; he returned to his handkerchief—burst into tears again under the pathetic influence of his own idea.

Mrs. Lecount left him for a minute to dismiss the coachman. When she returned to the parlor she found him with his hand on the bell.

"What do you want, Sir?" she asked.

"I want to tell the servants to get your room ready," he answered. "I wish to show you every attention, Lecount."

"You are all kindness, Mr. Noel; but wait one moment. Where he well to have these papers put out of the way before the servants come in again. If you will place the Will and the Sealed Letter together in one envelope—and if you will direct it to the admiral—I will take care that the inclosure so addressed is safely placed in his own hands. Will you come to the table, Mr. Noel, only for one moment more?"

No! he could not, and would not move from the fire; he was sick and tired of writing; he wished he had never been born, and he loathed the sight of pen and ink. All Mrs. Lecount's patience, and all Mrs. Lecount's persuasion, were required to induce him to write the address and address for the second time. She only succeeded by bringing the blank envelope to him upon the writing-desk, and putting it cunningly on his lap. He grumbled, he even swore, but he directed the envelope in the terms: "To Admiral Bartram, St. Cross-in-the-Marsh, Exeter." Mrs. Lecount. With that exception the last of compliance he coolly—and with a sigh of relief—threw in the fiercest terms, to seal the envelope.

There was no need to press this proceeding on him. He sealed it with a will on the table; and it mattered nothing whether he used it or whether a person in his confidence used it for him. Mrs. Lecount sealed the envelope with its two important inclosures placed safely inside.

The cook was preparing for the last time, and paused for a moment before she put the sealed packet away. looked at it with a triumph too deep for words. She smiled as she slipped it into the bag. Not the shadow of a suspicion that the Will might contain superfluous provisions and expressions which no practical lawyer would have used; not the vestige of a doubt whether the Letter was quite as complete a document as a practical lawyer might have made it, troubled her mind. In this instance—born of her devotion for Magdalen and her hunger for revenge—in blind reliance on her own abilities, and on her own luck, she had created the future implied in the promise of the morning's work.

She had ordered her evening-dip. Noel Vanstone rang the bell. On this occasion the summons was answered by Louisa.

"Is my room ready, my dear?" said her master; "this lady will sleep here to-night. And air my warm things; this lady and I are going away to-morrow morning."

The civil and submissive Louisa received her orders with attention, darted an angry look at her master's impenetrable guest, and left the room. The servants were evidently all attached to their mistress's interests, and were all of one opinion on the subject of Mrs. Lecount.

"Now, Lecount," said Noel Vanstone, with a sigh of infinite relief. "Come and sit down, Lecount. Let's be comfortable—let's gossip over old times."

Mrs. Lecount accepted the invitation, and drew an easy-chair to his side. He took her hand with a confidential tenderness, and held it in his, while the talk went on. A stranger looking in through the window would have taken them for mother and son, and would have thought to himself, "What a happy home!"

The cook brought Noel Vanstone, consisted, as usual, of an endless string of questions, and was devoted to the entire rejection of them and his future prospects. Where would Lecount take him to when they went away the next morning? To the Continent, if they should be lucky in London, while Lecount went on to St. Cross to give the sealed the Letter and the Will? Because his wife might follow him if he went to the admiral's? Well, there was something in that. Where was he ought to be safely concealed from her in some comfortable lodging near Mr. Lecount's? Why near Mr. Lecount's, yes, yes, yes, sure—to know when the law would do to help him. Would the law set him free from his wife, if he found her again? In How tiresome of Lecount not to know! Would the law say he had gone and married himself a second time, while he had been living with the Wretch like husband and wife in Scotland? Any thing! anybody assumed to be a marriage was a marriage (he had heard) in Scotland? How excessively tiresome of Lecount to be so ignorant! He knew nothing about it! Was he to stay long in London by himself, with nobody but Lecount to come to see him? Lecount came back to him as soon as she had put those important papers in the admiral's own hands? Lecount consider herself still at his service? The good Lecount! The excellent Lecount! Any thing for all the law business was over, what then? Why not leave this horrid England and go abroad again? Why not go to France, to some cheap place near Paris—say Versailles? say St. Germain? In a nice little French house—cheap? With a nice French cook—who wouldn't starve them, or be insolent in the grease-pot? With a nice little garden—where he could work himself, and get health, and save the expense of keeping a gardener? It would be a bad idea? And it seemed to promise well for the future—didn't it, Lecount?

So he ran on—the poor, weak creature! the object, miserable little man!

As the darkness gathered at the close of the short November day, he began to grow drowsy—his cosmetic repetitions came to an end at last—he fell asleep. The wind outside sang its mournful winter-song; the tramp of passing footsteps, and the rolling wheels on the road, ceased in dreary silence. He slept on quietly. The fire-light rose and fell, and threw little facts, and his nerveless, drooping hands. Mrs. Lecount had not pitied him yet. She began to pity him now. Her poor weak pigeon! Her sensitive bird with his wax secured; he had put his future life, of his own accord, under her fostering care—the fire was warm, and all the circumstances were favorable to the growth of Christian feeling. "Poor creature!" said Mrs. Lecount, looking at him with a grave compassion—"Poor wretch!"

The dinner hour roused him. He was cheerful and excited when he returned to the table of the cheap little house in France; he smirked and simpered; and talked through his dinner, while the housemaid and Louisa waited, turn and turn about, under protest. When dinner was over, he returned to his comfortable chair before the fire, and Mrs. Lecount followed him. He resumed the conversation—which meant, in his case, repeating his questions. But he was not so quick and ready with them as he had been earlier in the day. The more he forgetfulness, the longer and longer intervals—they ceased altogether. Toward nine o'clock he fell asleep again.

It was not a quiet sleep this time. He muttered, and groaned in restless, broken fits and from side to side of the chair. Mrs. Lecount purposely made noises enough to rouse him. He never woke. He never even opened his eyes. He walked about the room restlessly, with a new idea in his mind—the idea of writing a terrible letter; a letter of eternal farewell to his wife. How was it to be written? a what language should he express his feelings? The powers of Shakspeare himself would be unequal to the emergency! He would die the victim of an outrage entirely without parallel. A wretch had crept into his bosom! A viper had hidden herself in his flowers! He would write to the fiend to brand her with the infamy she deserved? He stepped with a suffocating sense in him of his own impotence to express the scorching his fist tumultuously in the empty air.

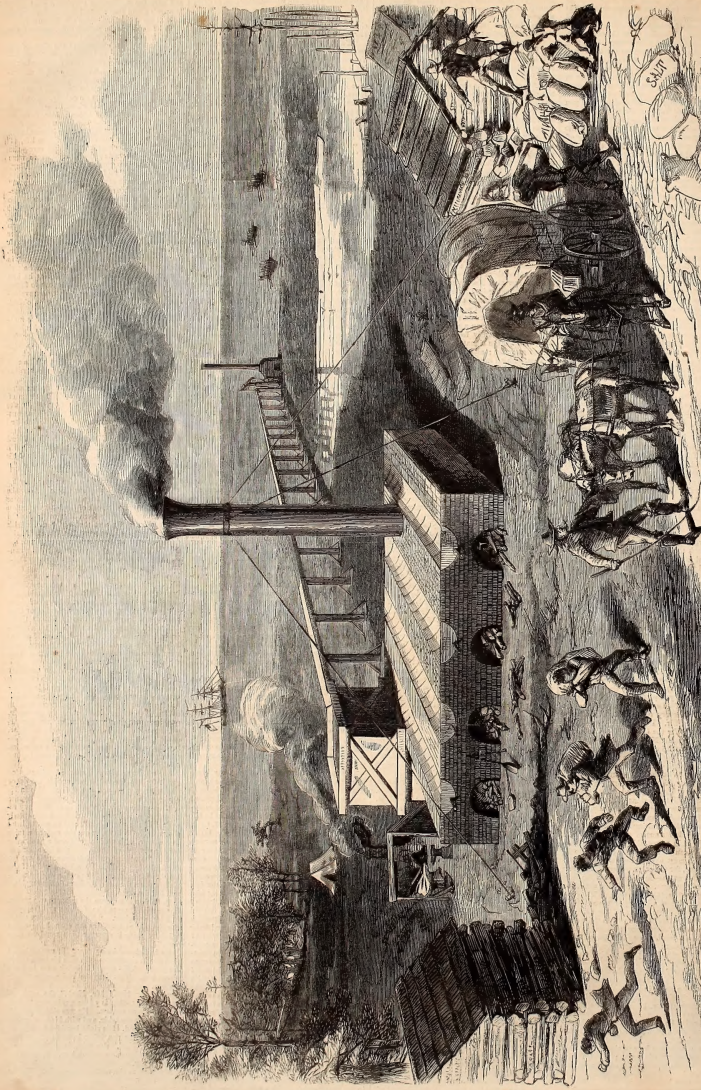
Mrs. Lecount interfered with an energy and a resolution inspired by serious alarm. After the heavy strain that had been laid on his weakness and his fears, an outbreak of passionate agitation as was now bursting from him might be the intervention of the last straw—the last of the strength to travel the next day. With infinite difficulty, with endless promises to return to the subject, and to consult him about it the morning, she prevailed on him at last to go up stairs and compose himself for the night. She gave him her arm to support him. On the way stairs his attention to her great relief, became suddenly absorbed by a new form of self-consciousness. A certain warm and comforting mixture of wine, egg, sugar, and spices, which she had often been accustomed to make for him in former times, and which he thought he should relish exceedingly before he went to bed. She actually helped him on with his dressing-gown, then went down stairs again to make his warm drink in the little parlor fire.

She rang the bell, and ordered the necessary ingredients for the mixture of the housemaid's name. The servants, with the small ingenious malice of their race, brought up the materials one by one, and slapped kept her waiting for them as long as possible. She had got the sauce-pan, and the spoon, and the tumbler, and the nutmeg-grater, and the sugar, and the lemon, and the paper, at the spices—when she heard him above walking backward and forward in his room. Her own exciting himself on the old subject again beyond all doubt.

She went up stairs once more; but he was too quick for her—he heard her outside the door, and when she opened it she found him in his chair, with his back cunningly turned toward her. Knowing him too well to attempt any remonstrance, she merely announced the speedy arrival of the warm drink, and turned to leave the room. As she did so, she noticed a desk lying in a corner, with an ink-and a paper-case on it, and tried, without attracting his attention, to take the opportunity of his back being turned to her, to close the desk and the paper-case quick for her again. She had barely succeeded in the table, for fear of offending him, and left the room.

In half an hour more the mixture was ready. She carried it up to him, foaming and fragrant, in a large tumbler. "He will sleep after this," she thought to herself—"he will sleep all night!"

He had changed his place. He was sitting at the table in the corner—still with his back to her writing. The desk and the paper-case had not moved him. This time she had caught him in the fact.



"Oh, Mr. Noel! Mr. Noel!" she said, reproachfully, "what is your promise worth?"

He made no answer. He was sitting with his left elbow on the table, and with his head resting on his left hand. His right hand lay back on the paper with the pen lying loose in it. "Your drink, Mr. Noel," she said, in a kinder tone, stooping upwilling to offend him. He took no notice of her.

She went to the table to see him. What was he doing?

He was dead!

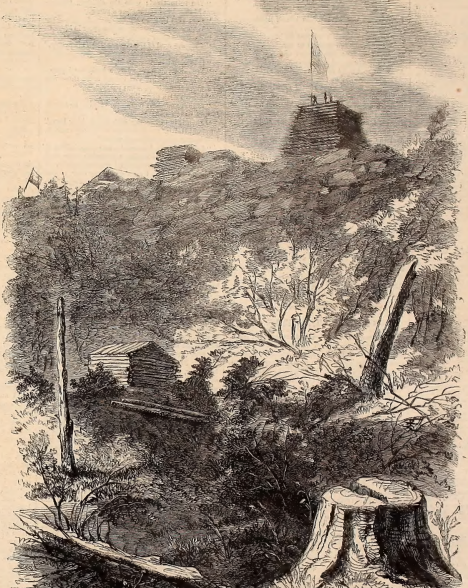
THE END OF THE FIFTH CHAPTER.

DESTRUCTION OF A REBEL SALT FACTORY, ON THE COAST OF FLORIDA, BY THE CREW OF THE UNITED STATES BARK "KINGFISHER."—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER ENGAGED.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

SALT-WORKS IN FLORIDA.

We publish on page 732 a view of the DESTRUCTION OF A SALT MANUFACTORY ON THE COAST OF FLORIDA by the crew of the United States bark Kingfisher. The affair is described in the following letter from an officer engaged:

"U. S. BARK 'KINGFISHER,' ST. JOSEPH'S BAY, FLA., Sept. 15, 1862.



"I am glad to say that, after waiting all this time, I have had a chance to see active service. You can imagine with what pleasure we received the order to up anchor, as we knew our destination was the salt-works, at the head of the bay.

"About two weeks since we had a lot of contrabands come off, who informed us that there were extensive salt-works at the town of St. Joseph, making from 100 to 150 bushels a day, and not yet completed. We sent a flag of truce, and politely informed them that they must stop, or we should destroy them. They paid no attention to us, but continued their fire day and night.

"We got under way at daylight, sailed up the bay with a fair wind, and came to anchor about a quarter of a mile from the works. As we came in sight we could perceive an unusual excitement, and observed wagons driving inland at a furious pace. We gave them two hours to quit, and then fired a few shells into the works, which had the effect of bringing two contrabands to the beach with a salt-bag, which they waved most furiously. We sent a boat for them, and found out that they had removed about two hundred bags of salt and some provisions, but that every thing remained with this exception; and also the intelligence that there were about eighty guerrillas, mounted, three miles back in the country, and would probably be down to see what was going on. As soon as we obtained this information we manned all the boats, leaving enough men on board to man the battery. I had been ordered to take command of the picket-guard, and station them about a quarter of a mile inland, surrounding the works. You may imagine that was rather skittish work with twenty men to go into the woods out of sight of the ship; but we all drew up on the beach, the pickets in front (in all about fifty men), loaded muskets and fixed bayonets—the whole under command of Mr. Hallet, executive officer. We started, whistling Yankee Doodle. I advanced my men in a straight line to the other side of the works, when we entered the woods and extended our lines entirely around the place. The main body then began their work of destruction, and in less than two hours the whole place was in flames, and the machinery broken up.

"I send you a sketch. The whole coast of Florida is lined with these works of a smaller size. This one, when finished, would have been capable of making five hundred bushels a day, at $10 per bushel.

"When the new military colony is fairly under way these salt factories will probably become of some national importance.

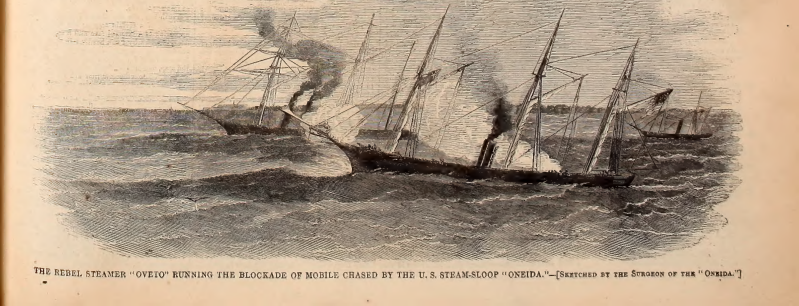
SUMMIT STATION ON MARYLAND HEIGHTS.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We republish herewith a picture by Mr. Waud, representing

SUMMIT STATION ON MARYLAND HEIGHTS.

Maryland Heights is the highest point occupied by the army. The signal-station commands the whole country for many miles around, and is in constant communication with other stations, conveying messages to and from head-quarters. Maryland Heights is by nature nearly impregnable, and could easily be held by four regiments against 50,000 men. From it Harper's Ferry, and Bolivar, and Loudon Heights are entirely commanded, as well as Pleasant Valley, and the towns of Sandy Hook and Knoxville.



The view from the summit is a magnificent one. The Potomac and Shenandoah rivers, the Blue Ridge, the Bull Run Mountains, the Kittoctan Mountains, North and South Mountains, etc.—the towns of Winchester, Charlestown, Martinsburg, Hagerstown, Williamsport, Shepherdstown, and a number of others, are all overlooked by these heights, from which the lines of both armies are also visible. At night, through a powerful glass, the enemy's pickets are visible. But perhaps the most interesting scene is the view at sunrise, when the valleys are filled with joy — looking over the clouds tinged rose-red by the sun, it seems as if a violent sea had been frozen into stillness at an instant, the mountain rising like islands from the heavy masses of vapors.

CONVALESCENT SOLDIERS.

We publish on page 721 an illustration of CONVALESCENT SOLDIERS ON THEIR WAY TO JOIN THEIR REGIMENTS, from a sketch by Mr. J. A. Oertel. He writes:

"The subject struck me when I saw it as one of interest in the present period. Washington just now is very dry and dusty, as I have indicated in the sketch. The soldiers were under escort. This is military fashion. They were on their way to the railway station near the capital, and belonged to different regiments, representing nearly all the States, and were in every variety of garb. You will perceive they are not in Broadway fashion. The soldier who has seen service is a different looking object from the trim gent he was when he left home."

The thinned regiments of the Army of the Potomac which returned from the Peninsula in September last have been considerably recruited by the arrival of convalescent soldiers from hospital. At one time there were 20,000 soldiers sick and wounded in the great military hospitals at Newport News and Fortress Monroe—at least so said the newspaper correspondents. Now these hospitals are comparatively empty. Wounds have been healed, and the bracing air of October has dispelled the fevers engendered by the Chickahominy malaria.

THE REBEL STEAMER "OVETO" RUNNING THE BLOCKADE OF MOBILE CHASED BY THE U. S. STEAM-SLOOP "ONEIDA."—[SKETCHED BY THE SURGEON OF THE "ONEIDA."]

THE ESCAPE OF THE "OVETO."

WE publish herewith an illustration of the REBEL STEAMER "OVETO" RUNNING INTO MOBILE under the fire of the United States steam-sloop Oneida on 4th September ult. We mentioned the circumstance at the time. It turned out that the rebel had only thirteen men on board who were fit for duty at the time. Secretary Welles, deeming that Commander Preble, who was in command of our squadron off Mobile, had been remiss in the execution of his duty, dismissed him from the navy in consequence. From this appeal Commander Preble has appealed to the President in the following letter:

"UNITED STATES SLOOP 'ONEIDA,'
OFF MOBILE, Oct. 10, 1862.

"To the President of the United States:

"SIR,—I do not believe you would do intentional injustice to any one; yet you have done me the most cruel injustice, and dismissed me from a service in which I have passed twenty-seven years of my life, without trial, without a hearing, and on insufficient and incomplete evidence.

"You have assailed my honor, which is dearer to me than life, and you have caused to be proclaimed that I failed to do my utmost to take and capture a vessel of the enemy, and omitted to perform the most ordinary duty of an officer. This sentence and this opinion you have directed to be read to the assembled crews of every vessel in the navy and entered upon the ships' logs.

"I can prove by every officer and man on board this ship, or who was present on the occasion referred to, that I did do my utmost to overtake, capture, or destroy the Oveto at the time referred to, and that, omitting no duty, I performed my whole, entire duty energetically and faithfully, as I have ever done while in the service.

"I demand, therefore, a fair, and full, and instant investigation of all the circumstances before a Court of Inquiry, and, when acquitted, that my innocence shall be proclaimed in the same manner as the sentence of dismissal has been promulgated, and that the record of my disgrace shall, by official order, be expunged from the log-books of the navy.

"As Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, I ask of you this justice, which I am sure you will grant.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"GEORGE HENRY PREBLE, Commander United States Navy."

Together with copy of this appeal, Commander Preble has sent us the following extracts from the evidence of his officers.

Lieutenant Commander Sicard, executive officer, says:

"The ship was prepared for action in season, and when the character of the chase became apparent you did your utmost to capture or destroy her. As far as my observation went you displayed zeal, energy, and anxiety in pursuit of the chase....I can not suggest any precaution you omitted."

Lieutenant Brown says:

...."The crew were at quarters and the ship cleared for action in ample season; and when the character of the chase was become apparent you did, in my opinion, do your utmost to overtake, capture, or destroy her. I know of no duty committed to a commanding officer that you omitted on that occasion. So far as I observed you did exhibit energy, zeal, and anxiety in the pursuit to overtake and capture the chase....I can not suggest any precautions that were omitted."

Chief Engineer Dade says:

"In my opinion you cleared your ship for action in the promptest manner, and exhibited the greatest energy, zeal, and anxiety in overtaking and capturing the chase."

Acting-Master F. M. Green says:

"The awnings were furled, decks cleared, and crew called to quarters in ample time for any emergency.... But for his superior speed, which enabled him to draw ahead of us, nothing could have saved him....Until the Oveto was close to us I felt sure she was one of the number of English steamers-of-war which I have seen inspecting the blockade."

Paymaster Hassler says:

"The energy and zeal with which you began the action, and, so far as my observation extended, continued it, will be always remembered by me....Of vigilance there certainly was no neglect....That the ship was cleared for action I have stated above; and that you did not fail to do your utmost to overtake, capture, or destroy the vessel we were pursuing was evident to myself from your repeated orders for quicker firing and cautions to greater accuracy of aim, as well as to the engineers....I have carefully read the Act approved July 17, 1862, articles 1 and 2, and paragraphs 9 and 10 of article 3, which relate to commanders of vessels, and I can not imagine any duty there enumerated which you failed to perform on that occasion. I do not think more than four shots were fired when, being in the ward-room, I heard you on deck give the order several times to go ahead faster; and, on going out into the steerage country, inquired what was the matter, when one of the engineers told me the engines were doing the best the steam would allow, owing to the recent repairs on the boilers."

Surgeon Taylor says:

"I cheerfully bear witness, Sir, that on this occasion, so far as my knowledge extends of such matters, you did your utmost to capture or destroy this vessel of the enemy from the moment you recognized her as such, and that the ship was cleared for action in due time—neither did you, in any manner whatever, manifest a want of energy or zeal in your official acts."

Acting-Master Thomas Edwards says:

"In my opinion your ship was prepared and cleared for action in the promptest manner, and, under the circumstances, you left nothing undone that could have been done, and I have every reason to believe you did your utmost to take, capture, or destroy the vessel you were in pursuit of. There is no duty that I could see at the time you omitted; and you showed the greatest energy, zeal, and anxiety to overtake and capture the chase."

Acting-Master Elijah Ross says:

"I consider you did all that could have been done to capture the steamer after discovering she was an enemy."

Captain's Clerk, J. T. Dalton, says:

"I was on the poop with you most of the time, being sent for by you to the engine-room several times to inquire if we could not increase our speed, each time receiving from the engineer on watch the answer—they could do no better....When we had rounded to and abandoned the chase you called to the First Lieutenant and asked if there was no way in which we could get in and 'get that fellow'—exhibiting the utmost anxiety to capture and destroy him."

Assistant-Engineers Morrison, M'Murtrie, Fitch, M'Ilvaine, and Brower unite in saying:

"Your energy as displayed on that occasion could certainly not have been questioned by those who were familiar with the circumstances. Every thing was done that could have been done to defeat her intentions, and no exertions were left untried to prevent his entering. The escape of the Oveto could not, in our opinion, have been justly attributed to any dereliction of duty on your part while existing circumstances were so favorable to her."

Boatswain Herold, who was aloft, says:

"While they were loosing sails we fired into her, and kept up a continuous fire until she got out of our range. Several of our shot struck her, though she did not slacken her speed for a moment....She continued to gain on us rapidly, and, as we were now very close to the ruined light-house on Sand Island, it being now dark, we wore round and returned to the anchorage."

Midshipman Wood says:

"Captain Preble gave orders to go ahead as fast as possible—heard answer returned from engine-room that 'we were doing our best.'....In fifteen minutes we had increased our elevation from 400 to 1000 yards."

A DREAM.

"Oh! for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still!"

I DREAMED last night of an isle of light
Far off in a waveless sea,
And never in Fancy's wildest flight
Came there such dreams to me.
I sailed in a boat like a pearl afloat,
With never a sail nor oar—
A vision so bright ne'er crossed the sight
Of mortal man before.
And at times I thought that I faintly caught
The snatch of a murmured song,
And a strange deep sound encompassed me round
Like the tread of a mighty throng.
Then a land so bright broke on my sight
That my dazzled eyes grew dim;
And the sound of ten thousand harps I heard,
And the tones of a wondrous hymn.
And oh! among the countless throng
That moved on the shining shore
I saw the face of one whom I thought
Had vanished for evermore.
Then I called again that sacred name
That has not left my breath
Since I knelt by the side of an upturned face
In the frozen beauty of Death.
Then all was hushed, and my mad brain rushed
Back to this earth again,
And I woke with a lingering sound in my ears,
That pierced through the gloom of darkening years
And soothed my heart's wild pain.
But oh! when shall I see that waveless sea,
And stand on that shining shore,
And feel the touch of that vanished hand,
And look in those eyes once more?

HELEN CHRISTIAN.

SHE must have hurried to have avoided them, and the stubborn Scotch blood rebelled against that, so Helen Christian kept her leisurely pace and met them just by her own gate. Mary Joceleyn, a girl in mourning, with the look that is called high-bred, and a general air of being unattainable in the very droop of the black plume in her hat, and the sparkle of the jet clasp at her slender waist, passing with a quick, careless bend—her brother Paul, captain in the army, evidently by the interpretation of his shoulder straps, bowing low and glancing back over his shoulder, as they went down the steep road to the river. Nothing very special in such an encounter; yet as the young school-teacher went up the little graveled path, she found that she was trying hard to console something in her mental or moral economy had been hurt and was crying out vigorously. What was it? She stopped to think it over a little before going into the house.

A few rods further on the path stopped short, as any prudent and thinking path would be apt to do, when there was only a low, somewhat shaky paling to keep it from running off into the ravine, that between its steep hurry to reach the river, and the getting entangled in a mass of trees and vines, all pushing and shouldering their way out from the stones and dark and damp to the free air, in most disorderly fashion, looked not of the most inviting. Here was an arbor and a chair (which I suppose I may call rustic, as a barrel with the front half cut away and covered with canvas certainly doesn't smack of Roux's) in which Helen sat down.

There was the fair sweep of river, and the two wooded promontories holding a quiet, fairy bay in their little crescent, and so close on her left hand that she could almost have touched it—the hill, against which her little home leaned, already warming with purple and dusky shades as though nature were trying her hand at coloring and foreshadowing to herself the autumn mosaic that was to come—the hill that she loved, because it was lovingly alive with growing, twining, trailing, rustling, chirping, singing life, and amidst storm and mist, and out of morning flush and unutterable evening splendors looked peacefully down on the solemn convocations of woods, and the lower hills surging up toward it, and the bronzed fields, and the broad roads, like a faithful witness for a truth; but she could hear nothing of the tender hill voices now. She was too busy looking across the sudden slope of their own garden-patch, and the sunken road, the rise on the opposite side, and the clump of maples, to a building set on a hill so that it could not be hid, thrown out against the evening sky large and square and dark, that looked as if it could never have relentings over a little white birdsnest of a cottage cowering under a hill, and was in fact the characteristic residence of the aristocratic Joceleyns; looking with eyes that would not have differed very widely in expression had they been glaring at it from under a red cap and across a barricade of paving stones.

Just then came out, not from the hill-side or floating on a spear of thistle-down, but unprosaically from the kitchen door, a fairy of that gentle domestic sort that puts a little leaven of comfort in every body's baking, and fills up the chinks of every one's shortcomings, with as much bustle as the air makes about being breathed in; Alice, the sickly elder mother-sister of the orphan Helen.

She laid a thin hand on her dreaming sister's shoulder.

"Are you looking at the mountains, dear?"

"Doesn't it seem as if they were the very ramparts of the unseen world, and as if that quivering, burning mass of color was just the glory streaming out from the heavenly gates opened wide?"

"I suppose so—I was not thinking."

"Think now, then; it is so beautiful. I don't believe any painter would dare to give us brown and sienna gleams like those thick strewn in that blue water. See, Helen; it might be the sapphire pavement that the Jewish elders saw under his feet, and that color that lives and burns, and is transparent though massed together, 'the body of the heavens in his clearness.'"

Still Helen looked over at the stone pile that had beaten back the straying sunbeams and dying light, and taken unto itself the shadows, perhaps because of its kind.

"You seem tired; were the children troublesome?" asked her sister after a pause.

"Yes; that is, not very."

"Who was that passing as you came in?"

"Mary and Paul Joceleyn."

"They are fond of the river walk; it is pretty." Helen rose abruptly.

"It is very damp—come in."

"Yes, and you must hurry a little, for I promised Mrs. Simms that you should come there this evening. They have a lint party."

"I don't wish to go."

"Is that your best reason for staying at home? It seems such a shabby one."

"Then it is in keeping with every thing here," burst out Helen. "I am sure we are shabby enough. Just look at your dress and mine!"

"I do, my dear, frequently, and regard them as monuments of art, feminine triumphs over such trifles as time, and the general wear-out-ability of all things human. I assure you, my dear, as you walk about, that dress has quite a distingué air; and hath the merino a voice that it should cry aloud, I am of the piece-day and belonged to great Aunt Martha. My flounce is but a delusion and a snare and a vanity altogether for the better hiding of the piece on the bottom, and I am not a well-to-do and prosperous dress, and don't belong to a person in good circumstances."

Thus chattered our good Helen, all unconscious of the vision of drooping plume and sparkling clasp, dainty-broidered handkerchief and trim boot, and their meaning, that was haunting Helen, who in her turn despised herself for paltriness of feeling, and never dreamed that these were but the bubbles on the surface telling of an unsuspected love, and unacknowledged pride doing battle in the depths of her heart.

Sudden glamour had robbed home of its grace—that was all she knew, making every thing to her coarse and mean, even herself. And here came in the true reason of her disinclination for Mrs. Simms and her lint-party, lest she should meet Paul and his sister, and, by comparison, be humbled in her own eyes and his. But despite reluctance she went, for mild Alice was a very Ahasuerus when she thought duty involved, though the face that bent over her basket in the corner was as sober as it was fair. She knew when the Joceleyns came—she heard Paul's voice in the hall, and felt, even in the little room where she sat apart, the flutter in the parlor atmosphere, as Mary Joceleyn rose a full moon on the horizon of Mrs. Simms and company, and in the light of her approval dimpled and glanced the ripples of every one's talk, save the one little Jacobin in her lonely corner.

Amidst the buzzing and chattering Paul, however, was restless—he missed something, and at last slipped out to look for it, found it, as he had half expected, sitting in a quiet that was good to look at, after the parlor flouncing and giggling, with a face cool and veiled in expression indeed, but with wondrous possibilities of depths of light and sweetness that might shine out from under golden-brown lashes, or soften the curves of the mobile mouth; no dimples or bright look for him just then, however, only a somewhat ungracious sweep of the black skirt when she found that he would sit close by her, and a crisp "Good-evening."

"You are retired in your tastes."

"I can work better. The tongue always wins in a race with the fingers."

"Is that a hint to me? Well, I will be good and not talk, only give me something to do."

Helen coolly handed him a bit of linen and went on without a word. Paul bit his lip, looked at the square morsel, turned it round, glanced again at the smileless face near him, pulled out a thread spitefully and broke it, raged inwardly, finally burst out in speech.

"What have I done now?"

"Broken a great many threads apparently."

"Helen, you are— Well, what is it?"

The last half of the sentence being addressed to his sister, who stood coolly scanning them from the door with a look that emphatically denied any other recognition of Helen than as a lint-pulling machine, that was occupying valuable Joceleyn time.

"Paul" (with a slight tinge of impatience sounding sharply through the polite resignation of her tone), "won't you please come to the front-room? You are wanted there."

"I really—"

"But, Paul—" beckoning him into the shadow of the hall for a whispered conference. Scarcely was he there when Helen, who was weary, head, fingers, and heart, went at once for hood and shawl, and slipped out without opposition, for, as she said to herself in bitterness of heart, "No one missed her."

She walked fast along the blank, starless road, trying to think her triumph sweet, for just then it seemed to her a most Jephthah-like victory; but fast as she walked some one followed her at even quicker pace, came close behind her, and heard her crying softly to herself, and taking her arm slipped it under his, holding the hand fast in his own. Helen looked up at the tall figure beside her in the dim light, and began to tremble a little.

"Captain Joceleyn!"

"Even so, the military person from whom you ran away, and who pursues his enemies as professionally bound."

"I did not—"

"Hush, Helen! It is time for us to be in earnest. I have something to tell you, only I can not say it out here in the gloom and damp. May I come in when we reach your home?"

Helen's "Certainly" was very faint indeed, and then they walked on to the little door in utter silence. With true girlish inconsistency she had hoped that Alice might be up, and by her presence prevent her hearing what she most wished; but the fire-light was the only thing stirring in the pure, fragrant little room, that, half in shadow, looked all manner of sweet possibilities of fairy hauntings. Alice had left a sofa drawn up by the bright hearth, and there Paul seated himself by the side of Helen, watching her quietly as she threw off her hood and loosened her cloak, the deft white fingers trembling so that it was hard to undo the ribbon at her throat.

She had ventured but one look at his face, and had seen then how thoroughly he was in earnest; for he had her at last, this shy, changeful, elfish, teasing thing, alone and within his very grasp—so close that his breath stirred the knot of ribbon in her hair, and she was neither perverse nor defiant, but shrinking and mutely imploring, and his were no weak fingers through which opportunity might slip.

He commenced coolly enough.

"I don't know as I told you, Helen. I am going back to-morrow afternoon."

"Going back!"

"To the army. I am quite well, and, I think, am needed."

Helen sat mute, only (though it might have been the deceitful light) he fancied that he caught a sudden tremor of the downcast lashes. In vain she tried for an answer—voice and words would not come at her bidding—all the pain and anger of that evening and the desolation of the future were upon her; her eyes were filling fast with tears, her cheeks burned with sudden fever, sobs swelled in her throat. She tried to turn away, but he would not suffer it, but held her close, bending down to look into the very depths of her eyes.

"My darling child! I had begun to fear that you really did not love me. I am so rejoiced. I think now I shall be worth two in battle."

Helen struggled to free herself, not with girlish timidity, but with determination—pushed him quite away, looking toward, but not at him, as he sat, grieved and amazed, saying, in a voice not in the least like her own,

"I do love you, Paul, but this must be the end—this is all."

"All?"

"Yes. It is quite hopeless; so it will be best never to speak of it again."

"Why hopeless? You will wait for me, and, if God spares me, will be my little wife?"

"No."

"Helen!"

"I am quite in earnest. I think I love you well enough, Paul, to die for you; but I could never live for you as the poor girl raised by you against the opposition of your family, and owing rather a life-long debt than love to you. Spare your arguments" (as he was about eagerly to interrupt). "You have surprised my love into confession, but my self-respect is like a rock; you can not shake it."

"Self-respect! You mean pride, to which, in comparison, Moloch was merciful."

"Call it what you will; I am firm in it."

"But you shall not be; I swear it. What! I love you with truth and passion and honor, and for a lifetime, and you let me go on day by day and weave the love and the hope of you in with every pulse of my life, to tell me at the end that you have a love indeed, but so frost-bitten with pride that it shall profit neither you nor me!"

"The Christians are a stubborn race," answered Helen, pale and cool. "If it comes to a contest of wills—"

"Yours will be overborne. Not because I am a despot, but because I have truth and right with me, as sooner or later you shall acknowledge; for be it one year, or two, or three, you will one day fling your pride in the dust, where it should be, and listen only to your love, cold and calculating as you are now."

With which he left her.

"Cold and calculating!" that was his good-night; his adieu also, for he made no further effort to see her; but having thus firmly and finally vindicated dignity, and the much-vaunted "self-respect," it is to be presumed that Helen, notwithstanding, was quite happy, though it was a kind of happiness on which she grew thin and spiritless; and Alice sadly noted that her only interest now was at reading-paper-time, perhaps because therein were often chronicled the doings of a certain Captain Joceleyn, who was a veritable Sir Launcelot, and was continually volunteering for desperate services, anxious, apparently, to be rid of life as fast as possible.

Truth was, she was always dreaming about the sounding of a certain step on the walk, and the appearing of a bronzed face and a uniform in the door, though why I can hardly tell, as, by her own showing, such appearance must have been hopeless; and at last the dream was fulfilled. She heard the step, caught the gleam of an epaulet, heard a voice not altogether familiar ask for Miss Christian, and rushed out to meet—a stranger.

She shrank back dismayed.

"I think there is some mistake."

"Not if you are Miss Christian—Miss Helen Christian; that is the name on this package that I promised to bring you."

He was holding out to her a little parcel, tied, sealed, and addressed to herself. She knew the handwriting, she knew also when and why parcels like that were sent. There was a ring—she had seen it often enough before—a cornelian shield bearing the Joceleyn arms, and a note, clearly written and brief enough:

"Though in life you would have none of me, yet now perhaps you will wear my ring in remembrance; and when you look at it, believe that I loved you so well that, had I lived, you must have learned in time (hard as you are) to love me as well as you now love yourself."

She read it through once and again. Her face wore a strained, ghastly look, it is true; but then it was hard to breathe. She was not very sorry, after all—how could she be, when she could not even feel? So she simply said,

"He is dead, then?"

"I hope not—I think not; it was only a bullet through the cheek, gotten when we were charging over the bridge!" was the eager answer. "But he was down, and the rebels were close upon us; probably he is a prisoner, though Heaven knows what chance a wounded man has in their hands!"

So that was the end; for though others hoped (they said his proud mother and sister did), she knew better—she was sure that he was dead. And now the village talk began to run on Helen Christian and her altered looks.

One day, lying on the sofa—where she was always of late—she saw Alice smiling to herself and singing.

"You are very gay," she said, reproachfully.

"I am very glad!"

"Of what?"

Alice came and kneeled down by the sofa, smoothing away the soft hair and touching her lips to the wide forehead.

"Of what should I be glad, my darling? Could any thing make me glad in which my sister had not a share?"

"I—what is there for me, unless—but that is impossible."

Alice smiled.

Helen started up.

"Alice! do you want to kill me—what do you mean by smiling? Is he living? is he here? is he waiting?"

"You poor child, no! he is living, but they don't speak very hopefully of him. His wound was not so severe, but he was taken prisoner, half starved, and wholly neglected by the rebels. He has only been home two days."

"He is there, then."

"Yes; but what are you doing?" for Helen was up and tying on her bonnet.

"I am going to him, Alice, to show him how, for his sake, I can trample under foot the self that he said I loved better than him, and that were it listened to, would die before it would endure what I must."

"But Helen, think, they will not let you see him."

"Alice, I will see him."

And with that look not a doubt but she would. Stronger barriers than the wide doors of Joceleyn House, and stouter than their pride, have yielded again and again before such eyes and lips of determination. So now, when she was told that Captain Joceleyn could see no one, she only answered, "I must see him!" and stepped in. Mary Joceleyn came out into the hall with a darkening face as she recognized Helen.

"Miss Christian, my brother is very sick and can not receive visitors."

"I am not a visitor. I came to nurse him."

"We are more than obliged, but my mother and I have spoken for that office."

"Still I will see him!" cried Helen, with sudden passion, and her voice ringing out sharply caught the ear of Mrs. Joceleyn, who was passing through the hall. Mary, more than half cowed, turned and called to her.

"Mother, will you come here? This is that Helen Christian, and she insists on seeing Paul."

"Hush! Mary. Miss Christian, I am very sorry, but my son is quite unable to bear the excitement of seeing any one at present. It is really impossible."

The cool, polite scorn was sharper-edged than Mary's anger, and reddening Helen turned to go, then turned back again.

"I will not go. Don't you see I can not?" she exclaimed. "How dare you coolly measure out misery to others when you have not yet done with life yourself? How can you, who look so like Paul, be so hard to one whom he loves? Could I help it if he loved me? Could I help loving him back? Ask your own heart if my love is not true and real, when I, who rejected him from very pride, stand here now begging admittance of you as if it were an alms. If you have no pity for me, yet show some for your son, for, grant it ever so intolerable and humiliating a fact, yet he does love me, and I—oh! I will see him, do what you like."

Mother and daughter stood aghast. Serenity and conventionality were the decent Lares that presided over all Joceleyn arrangements, propriety the spell with which they conjured. They would know as well how to parley with an escaped tiger as with this pale, wild-eyed girl, so vulgarly in earnest, and reckless enough even for a scene—thing unheard of in the House of Joceleyn.

"It can do no harm," said Mrs. Joceleyn, at length, "and it may comfort him. Miss Christian, you can come with me."

Helen followed, trembling and totally unnerved now that her point was gained. With the air of one going to the stake Mrs. Joceleyn led the way to Paul's bedside.

"Paul, here is some one to see you!"

Paul turned a hopeless face that smote Helen with sharp self-reproach, looked with incredulous eyes, glowed suddenly with joy almost too great to be borne, caught both her hands and held them with something of the old strength.

"Oh, Helen, you have come at last! Now I shall live!"

She bent down and kissed him.

"I have come. I have flung my pride in the dust, as you said I would, Paul."

"And you will stay?"

"I will."

"Take off your hat, then. I want to be sure."

She threw it off at once.

"Think, Paul!" said his mother, unable longer to keep silent; "there is something more in life than a pretty face, of which you will sicken soon enough. An ancient and honorable name demands something of you. No Joceleyn before you has made a mésalliance!"

Paul only tightened his feeble grasp.

"You will not mind them?"

"No; not even words like that shall move me." Paul looked at his mother.

"You hear. You see how useless it would be to oppose. If I live she shall be my wife; living or dying I can love only her. Won't you be kind to her for my sake? It will be better for me than all your drugs."

Mrs. Joceleyn was only human; also here came in play reasoning peculiarly adapted to the grasp of the Joceleyn mind.

There was no doubting Paul's infatuation. That granted, arose the query, whether the patronizing and paternal attitude, or a useless, red-faced, scolding opposition were the most dignified, that is to say, the most Joceleyn-like.

The decision may be guessed, as I hear Paul (who is convalescent) is to be married next week to Helen from the old Joceleyn House, and that Mrs. Joceleyn has the trousseau in charge.

MY TREASURE.

I have a treasure. What is it, say,
  O lady fair, O lady fair?
Is it a mirror to shine all day,
  Or pearls to braid my brown, brown hair?

A diamond buckle to clasp my shoon;
  A satin robe—like the glistening crest
Of the lake that ripples under the moon
  Zoned with rubies beneath my breast?

Is it a castle, with broad fair lands;
  A magic purse of caged red gold,
Whose swelling meshes within my hands
  Exhaustless store of riches hold?

Is it some wondrous beauty-charm,
  To steep my lips in brilliant dyes,
To mantle my neck in tresses warm,
  And tint my cheek and light my eyes?

Is it a crown and a throne of state,
  And a wand to wave o'er subjects leal,
With mailèd guards at my palace-gate,
  And a royal will to say and seal?

I tell thee, no: it is none of these,
  O lady fair, O lady fair!
But a little babe upon my knees
  To toss and pull my brown, brown hair.

Mme. DEMOREST, of No. 473 Broadway, New York, has recently introduced a very small and efficient SEWING-MACHINE, that makes the running-stitch exactly like hand-sewing. It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can not fail to use it with advantage. It is so diminutive that it can be carried about without inconvenience even in the pocket, and is attached to the table like a sewing-bird, and sold at only $5. Every lady can have a Sewing-Machine, and those who have one already will find this one a valuable auxiliary on account of the running-stitch.—[N. Y. Independent.

Duryeas' Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the competition of all prominent manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding.

Maizena

The food and luxury of the age, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without isinglass, with few or no eggs, at a cost astonishing the most economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little boiled in milk will produce rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, with directions.

A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Manufactured at Glen Cove, Long Island.

Harper's Pictorial History
OF
THE GREAT REBELLION
IN THE UNITED STATES.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers have commenced the issue in Numbers of a complete HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION IN THE UNITED STATES. The work has been for many months in course of preparation, by a writer every way qualified for the task.

The Introduction contains a clear and succinct account of the formation of the Confederacy of the States; the formation and adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and the establishment of the National Government; the origin, development, and progress of the doctrines of Nullification and Secession, and the various phases which they assumed until their final culmination in the Great Rebellion.

The History comprises a full account, drawn from the most authentic sources, of all the Events of the War; the intrigues of the Southern leaders at home and abroad; the gradual defection of one section; the great Uprising of the People for the maintenance of the National Life and Existence; the rapid creation of an immense Army and Navy; and the Battles by Land and Sea.

The Illustrations comprise Portraits of all those who have borne a prominent part in the struggle; Maps of the different localities; Plans of the leading actions; Views of every scene of interest, and of the most important Battles. These Illustrations are mostly from drawings taken on the spot by artists deputed for that purpose to accompany every division of our Army and Navy.

Every facility at the command of the Publishers has been employed in the preparation and execution of this work; and they confidently believe that it will form the most reliable and valuable history which can be prepared of THE GREAT STRUGGLE FOR THE AMERICAN UNION.

Mode and Terms of Publication.

The work will be issued in Numbers, each consisting of 24 pages of the size of "Harper's Weekly," printed from clear type, upon fine paper, and will probably be completed in about Twenty Numbers.

The Numbers will be issued at intervals of about three weeks.

The Price of each Number, which contains matter equivalent to an ordinary volume, will be Twenty-five Cents.

The Illustrations in each Number are alone worth the price asked. Men out of employment, especially can find no other work so sure of ready sale and good profits. For further particulars apply to the Publishers,

Lyon's Kathairon.
The delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is again put up by the original proprietor, and we have made with the same care, skill, and attention, which first created its immense and unprecedented sales of over one million bottles annually! It is sold out at 50 cents in large bottles. Two million bottles can easily be sold in a year when it is again known that the Kathairon is not only the most delightful hair dressing in the world, but that it cleanses the scalp of scurf and dandruff, gives the hair a lively, rich luxuriant growth, and prevents it from turning grey. These are considerations worth knowing. The Kathairon has been tested for over twelve years by the American people, and has proved to be the most beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon. It is daily performed, cheap and valuable. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

HON. HORATIO SEYMOUR, GOVERNOR-ELECT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

GOVERNOR SEYMOUR.

WE publish on the preceding page a portrait of Hon. HORATIO SEYMOUR, Governor-elect of New York. Governor Seymour is a man of some fifty-five years of age; he once filled the Gubernatorial office before, and discharged its duties with fidelity and success. He has now been elected by a majority of some 15,000 over General Wadsworth. Governor Seymour proclaimed his position in a speech delivered at Brooklyn during the canvass, and we make the following extract:

"Now, when the men of the South made the bayonet and the sword the arbiter (they elected, and not we); when they determined to settle it by blood (and not we)—the sword, so far as the present is concerned, must be the arbiter; and in our strong right arm it shall strike vigorous and true blows for the life of our country, for its institutions, and for its flag. Now let me say this to the higher law men of the North, and to the higher law men of the South, and to the whole world that looks on witnesses to the mighty events transpiring in this country, that this Union shall never be severed, no, never......Whatever other men may say, as for the conservative people of this country and as for myself as an individual—let other men say and think what they please—as for the division of this Union, and the breaking up of that great natural alliance which is made by nature and by nature's God, I never will consent to it, no, never, as long as I have a voice to raise or a hand to fight for this our glorious land."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1862.

THE RECENT ELECTIONS.

THE elections in the great Northern States have resulted uniformly in the defeat of the Administration candidates. New York and Pennsylvania, which supported Mr. Lincoln in 1861 and 1860 with majorities of 50,000 and 100,000, have gone decidedly in favor of the Democracy; the Democrats have carried the Republican States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and the dominant Republican party has suffered severe losses in Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa. It had previously lost ground in Connecticut and Maine. In the Congress which will assemble for the transaction of business a year hence the Democrats will have a decided majority.

Just two considerations are suggested by these startling evidences of a change in public opinion; first, what caused the change? next, what practical effect will it have on the prosecution of the war?

A number of plausible reasons have been assigned for the sudden increase of the Democratic and decline of the Republican vote throughout the North. Mr. Greeley thinks that the Republicans have gone to the war to fight, while the Democrats have staid at home to vote. But even the Tribune will not claim the men who enlisted from this city, as, for instance, Sickles's and Meagher's brigades as Republicans; and it was the large Democratic majority in this city which carried the State for Seymour. Again, every one who has correspondents in the army knows that the rank and file, at least in the army of the Potomac, sympathized with the Democracy, and cherished the ancient Democratic prejudice against the negro to the utmost extent. We are inclined to think that if the army had voted—as did the soldiers of Iowa, Missouri, and other States—the Democratic majority in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, would rather have been increased than diminished. Another set of politicians, who sympathize more or less with the rebels, construe the recent elections as a rebuke to the men whom they call "Abolitionists," and infer that the North is ready to meet the South on the basis of some such compromise as that to which Senator Crittenden, in an unguarded moment, lent his previously-respected name. These politicians are probably equally mistaken with regard to the temper of both sections. The South is unwilling to accept any compromise, and if the successful Democracy attempt to make one, they will fail as ignominiously as they did at Charleston. So far as the Northern Democracy are concerned, they are quite as far from being prepared to admit that the Union is dissolved as the most ardent supporters of the Administration. A member here and there, hailing from this city or the West, and in his heart a partner in the guilt of the rebels, may attempt to assist their schemes; but the great bulk of the Northern Democracy are as loyal to the Union as Mr. Lincoln himself. Whatever they meant by their October and November votes, no one who knows them will believe that they meant to acquiesce in the severance of the Union.

So far as we can judge, the soundest explanation of the recent Democratic victories ascribes them to a general dissatisfaction with the results of the war. In some men this dissatisfaction took the shape of a revolt against the radical influences which have controlled the Administration from time to time. Others were dissatisfied because the President retained Generals M'Clellan and Buell in command. Others, again, and these probably constituted the majority, looked at the subject from no partisan point of view, but merely desired to testify their sense of disgust at the small results which have been achieved by the enormous outlay of men, money, spirit, and energy placed at the service of the Government by the loyal citizens of the United States. No nation in the world—not even France in 1790—ever placed itself, its sons, its means, its liberties, and its life so wholly and unreservedly in the hands of its Government as we did a year ago. The people of the North asked each other—what has Mr. Lincoln done with what we gave him? and voted accordingly.

With regard to the effect of the recent elections we can not see that they are calculated to lead to any important changes. A few traitors elected here and there will try to serve the rebel cause. But they will clearly prove powerless against the overwhelming loyalty of the Northern masses. From necessity the Democratic victors will have to go for a more thorough prosecution of the war. The people of the North—by whatever political designation they are known—are unanimous and resolute against the division of the country. A few Democratic leaders may be so blind as to dream of a compromise, disgracefully ignominious to the North, and practically fatal to the South. But these schemers will soon find themselves disavowed by both sections. In time of war, when the people understand themselves, there is but one party, and that is the party who goes for putting down the enemy. Whatever the intentions of the successful Democrats may have been, when the responsibility comes to be laid upon their shoulders they will find themselves compelled to pursue the same policy as their opponents, and to rely for success with the people upon excelling the Republicans in energy and zeal for the cause.

THE REMOVAL OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

WE record in another column the removal of GENERAL M'CLELLAN from the command of the Army of the Potomac, and the appointment of GENERAL AMBROSE E. BURNSIDE to the vacant post. The President appears to have determined upon the step in the last week of October; but for reasons which can readily be conceived it was not carried into effect till the 8th inst. A dispatch from General Halleck to the Secretary of War, bearing date October 28, explains the reasons which led the President to act. After the Battle of Antietam General Halleck first urged, then ordered General M'Clellan to move across the Potomac. He did not move for three weeks, and, in General Halleck's opinion, no good excuse existed for his disobedience and delay.

General M'Clellan's friends, who are legion, will urge in his defense that a General in command of an army of 200,000 men, and responsible not only for his own success but for their lives, is the best judge of when and how he should move, and can not be bound to obey the orders of persons at a distance from the scene of action, and without direct personal responsibility in the matter. It will doubtless further be urged that, however slow General M'Clellan may have been during the first three weeks of October, he was moving with remarkable celerity when the order for his removal was handed to him. Many other good arguments may be advanced in vindication of the displaced General, but they are not likely to be much heard of just now. Both the people and the army are too intent upon the great work of suppressing the rebellion to trouble themselves about side issues. After the war there will be time to inquire into and pass judgment upon them, and then, if injustice has been done to M'Clellan, he will probably be elected President.

Meanwhile it is a source of unmixed satisfaction to know that the Army of the Potomac is led by a man like Burnside, a soldier who to the greatest military skill unites dash, energy, and the prestige of success, and a man of the most exalted character and the noblest heart. The country unites in the cry, GOD SPEED BURNSIDE!

THE LOUNGER.

THE FACTS OF THE CASE.

REACTIONS may change events, but they can not alter principles. The Government of the United States and the Union, of which it is the supreme authority, are threatened by rebels in arms. That authority must be maintained entirely, or it is altogether overthrown. You may make never so small a hole in the side of your ship, but it will be large enough to admit the ocean, and your ship will inevitably go down. You may make the slightest concession of the threatened authority of the Government, but in making it you relinquish that authority utterly. If the city magistrates and police and militia, after endeavoring for many a day to disperse a riot, should at last say, "Very well, what is it you want?" and allow the rioters to destroy only one building or burn only one poor Irishman, that city is conquered. Is there any security for peace, for life any longer, except in the whim of the mob? It is precisely so with the war. Either the Government must be maintained in every particular of its authority, or it is dishonored entirely. To change it, to allow the rebels to go, to declare that such rebellions always end in compromise, is to renounce the Government altogether, and to proclaim the intention of surrender.

The Constitution of the United States clothes the Government with authority to do what, under any circumstances, it inevitably and instinctively would do; namely, defend its own existence by force. Whatever is necessary to this defense the Government may lawfully do; and it is, of course, itself the judge of the necessity. It may stop mouths and pens; it may seize property and liberate slaves; it may cut off supplies, and by famine and force and fear compel the refractory citizens to obedience.

All this the Government may do. Common-sense apprises us of it, even if it were not carefully provided by the Constitution that in case of rebellion and invasion the writ of habeas corpus may be suspended, and that the President, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy, shall forcibly compel submission to the law. But the Government is the people. If they disapprove what is done, it will be undone or it will be fruitless. If they are not in earnest, they will not justify earnest war. If they are in earnest, they will not tolerate trifling and delay.

In our own case the truth remains true whatever happens. If for any reason the people shall tire of the war, or the forcible compulsion of rebels to obey the law: if they shall say that they are willing to put down the insurrection if they can do it with half a million of men and five hundred millions of dollars, but not if the work requires six hundred thousand men and a thousand million of dollars: if they shall say that they are willing to use field-pieces but not gun-boats: if they say that they do not object to cutting off a supply train, but do object to touching, or even trying to touch, the source of the supplies: if they shall say that they are willing to shoot rebels in the field, but that they prefer to guard the slaves of rebels upon the plantations: if they shall declare that every body may say and do just what he pleases during the war, short of actually taking up arms against the Government: if they shall say that the rebellion was really caused by the men who are now fighting against it, and not by the rebels themselves: and, finally, if they shall say that the game is not worth the candle, and that they will no longer "imbrue their hands in fratricidal blood," they will compel the authorities to make peace with the rebels upon the best possible terms, whether of separation or compromise.

Such a result is inevitable if the people are tired of the war. That such a peace could be but a truce breaking into worse wars may be true, but that would not help the result. That such a peace would be the total destruction of the Government, the ruin of the popular system, and the betrayal of the hope of civil liberty every where, is unquestionably true; but what then? If the people are willing to betray themselves, to be forever disgraced, and to become the scorn of history, it is in vain that the authorities protest.

What then is the duty of every truly loyal man? Simply to show as plainly as he can that the welfare of each one of us depends upon the unconditional maintenance of the Government; that no civil right is secure for a moment except in this Government; and, therefore, that to maintain it the most decisive and radical measures must be adopted by the authorities and supported by the people. There have always been, there will always be, but two issues out of the war. One is absolute victory: the other is entire submission. If we are truly in earnest as the rebels are, we shall win the victory cost what it may. If we are not in earnest, we shall be conquered and disgraced.

GENERAL MITCHELL.

BY the death of General Mitchell the country loses one of the fiery souls that compel victory. The purity and fervor of his patriotism were of the antique mould. From the first words he spoke at the great Union Square meeting after Sumter, through his gallant and brilliant service at the West to the commencement of his Southern campaign, his life was an act of utter self-renunciation and devotion.

Those who saw him just before he left for the Department of the South were fully aware of his convictions as to the state of the country and the prospects of the cause. He knew, as every body else did, that to send him to Hilton Head, with the handful of men there, was to send him into exile. But he made no complaint. He said that he believed he was a good soldier. "As for Generalship I do not judge," he said; "but I know that the whole duty of a soldier is to obey orders, and I believe that I can do that." He did it. He came from Alabama when he was summoned to Washington in the shortest possible time. He reported for orders. He was told to wait. He waited and waited week after week, and was finally sent to South Carolina, and went.

There were doubtless divided counsels about him at Washington. He was a fighting General; a dashing, ardent, popular leader. He believed that the war must be fought out by every means. He did not believe in waiting, nor in gently tapping the enemy, nor in tampering with treason and traitors; but in sweeping suddenly, and striking stunning blows with overwhelming power. General Mitchell's theory of the war was, that it is a mortal conflict between the spirit of despotism and that of lawful Liberty; that there could be in the nature of things no concession, no compromise; that either the nation would conquer and establish its government permanently as the defense and guarantee of Liberty, or be dismembered and ruined. Born in Kentucky, he knew the section with which we are fighting. By disposition conservative, he doubted whether the people were ready to rely upon the principle indicated by Mr. Lincoln's election, and therefore apprehended with misgiving the possible result of the war which that election was sure to provoke. But when the war came he sprang to the field with the battle-cry of America and Liberty upon his lips, and they had no other language until they were cold forever.

He had bitter enemies—but they were not among the soldiers he commanded. It was said that he covered a great deal of territory in the southwest, and that if such work made a commander he was a good one. It was sneered that his exploits resounded in the newspapers, but were of no actual importance or military significance. It was coldly said that he was a better orator than soldier. But if any General in this war has done what he was sent to do, it is General Mitchell. His western services, within his means, do not suffer by comparison with those of any other officer who has served in that department. His inauguration of the Southern campaign was but partly successful at Pocotaligo; but not from want of skill in devising or bravery in the men. The battle was a victory as far as it went. The enemy were successively driven from the three positions they chose. Then our force withdrew, not being adequate to pushing further. But the partial successes of Generals who had every means have been hitherto, in the war, hailed by us, and reported by them, as victories.

Like all men who feel profoundly, and who occupy conspicuous positions in a civil war, General Mitchell will receive no unqualified censure or praise. There is not a man of military eminence in this war, unless it be, at the present moment, General Burnside, who is not, and who will not be, the object of intense party-feeling. Frémont, M'Clellan, Sigel, Halleck, Hunter, Buell are all vehemently extolled and censured. It is not a fate at which Mitchell repined. He had counted the cost, and he held every thing light when weighed with the salvation of his country. A soul of fire, he would willingly have sought by speech to kindle his fellow-citizens to the glow of his own conviction if he had not felt that his duty was with the sword. That duty is done now, and done nobly. May God rest the brave soldier, and inspire us all to speak and strike for our country with the same purity of purpose and fervor of conviction!

SOME NEW BOOKS.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S "Orley Farm" is admitted to be the best, as it is the most elaborate, of his novels. He leaves his usual beat. He steps out of Church into Court. He turns his back upon cathedral closes, and the little quarrels and match-makings of clergymen and their wives, and paints a picture of crime and its course at law which an English authority says is much the finest picture of the legal profession in English Literature. Mr. Trollope's peculiar style, which has Thackeray's intimacy with his reader without his racy elegance, and which is often flippant rather than easy, is remarkably adapted to the story of familiar life he is so fond of telling; while Millais's illustrations are equally modern and characteristic. There is a cheerful, chirping, John Bullish good sense in all that Trollope writes—a comfortable and not disagreeable depth of insight and observation—which account for his great current popularity. The friends of "Doctor Thorne" and "Framley Parsonage" will find the same charm in "Orley Farm."

The Memoirs of Dr. Nicholas Murray, by S. Irenæus Prime, are a brief account of the incidents in the life of a "self-made" man, as a certain class of strong-willed, self-relying people are called. Dr. Murray was a poor Irish boy who came to this country, and who, after a little while, if this paper had then been published, would have helped set the type, for he was a workman in this office; who was converted from the Romish to the Protestant Church, became a noted clergyman, and at last made his name widely known by a series of controversial letters to Bishop Hughes, under the signature of "Kirwan." These letters are most trenchant popular theological weapons. They had a great sale, and were doubtless of great service to the cause they advocated. Dr. Murray was evidently a hearty, vigorous man—of a generous nature, and a clear, positive mind. Mr. Prime's Memoir judiciously leaves "Kirwan" to tell his own story as far as practicable.

Mrs. Oliphant's Memoir of Edward Irving is the story of a very different life and work from those of Kirwan. He, too, was a clergyman, but it could hardly be said that his mind was clear. He was a noble man, and his life, in a certain way, was most romantic. No one who is at all interested in the religious history or romance of our times but will read it with the greatest interest. To many, also, the words of Thomas Carlyle, in speaking of Irving, will awaken the strongest wish to know exactly what he was. "But for Irving," says Carlyle, "I had never known what the communion of man with man means. His was the freest, brotherliest, bravest human soul mine ever came in contact with. I call him, upon the whole, the best man I have ever, after trial enough, found in this world or hope to find."

A novel, "Abel Drake's Wife," by John Saunders, is a story of a great deal of interest and power. General attention is so riveted by the great novelists that some word is essential to introduce the new aspirants. In this story there seems to us to be more real power than in such a tale as Bulwer's "Strange Story." Indeed, much of the finest talent in our literature is found in the less known novels—books like "The Collegians" or "A Lost Love."

Besides these works, there are the "Thirteen Months in the Rebel Army," an admirable interior view of the rebellion; and Mr. Beecher's "Eyes and Ears," a volume of delightful characteristic essays upon all kinds of subjects; and Mr. Marsh's "Origin and History of the English Language," a work of noble scholarship and great value.

If the war reduces the number of new books it does not injure their quality.

HOLDING UP THE HANDS.

THERE is a remarkable fact in our current history. The President is praised on all sides, yet nobody is satisfied with the conduct of the war. The "Radicals" cry, God bless him! The "Conservatives" talk of holding up his hands. Now somebody does not mean what he says. "If we all mean to stand by the President what are we quarrelling about? If we all mean to stand by the President provided he will do exactly what we wish him to do—we mean only that we would stand by Jeff Davis upon the same terms.

What the President means he has said.

"Oh yes," says the Conservative; "but he has been latterly under Radical pres-sure. Let him return to his former position."

"Thank you for nothing!" retorts the Radical; "he was formerly under the border State pressure."

"Exactly my position," replies the Radical.

"But my interpretation of the Constitution is the right one," says the Conservative.

"Not at all—ours is the right one," answers the Radical. "I am for the Union at every cost."

"You are a disorganizer," asserts the Conservative.

"Can't see it," smiles the Radical.

"You're a—"

"You're mistaken."

Meanwhile the President has declared his policy. It is to maintain the Government and the Union at all hazards. And what do the people ask of him and will help to him? Merely that they may see a constant proofs of activity and earnestness in carrying out that policy. They know that they can suppress this insurrection, and that they can do it speedily. They will not quarrel with any measure of vigor or of rigor, whatever the politicians may say or do. Disgust at hesitation, languor, and absolute discontent with the course of military justice—fatigue with the pressure of a war which sometimes seems waged against their own generals as much as against the armies of the enemy, will often extort from them the sharpest censure. Generals, Cabinets, parties, are nothing. The country will. The former may and must be changed as swords decree. The latter must and shall be saved, whatever they may do.

To sustain the President, then, is to support his policy. If you like his policy you mean what you say in supporting him in his most earnest administration. If you dislike it, you are forsworn in declaring that you support him. He is the head of the constitutional power and duty. If his mistakes and abuses his power he can be impeached. But it is to be remembered that it is not simply those who threaten him that if he does not follow the advice of men who have always opposed him, his principles, and his measures, the war will be stopped by any and every means. That is not support—it is attempted coercion.

Meanwhile, again, the President is a man of convictions. He has certain profound persuasions and a very clear purpose. He knows whence he is sprung from, and upon what ground a permanent peace can be reared. He is cautious, conservative. But he knows that great revolutions do not go backward; while he is aware that when certain great steps in the direction are taken, every one of them will be loud outcries and apprehension. But the ninth wave touches the point of the tenth, for which the ninth will presently rise, although the next wave and the next should seem to slow falling water.

PORTRAIT OF A REBEL BY AN OLD MASTER.

ANOTHER, in the twelfth number of his Freelander, a paper which he published in 1715-16, during the attempt of the Pretender upon the throne of England, has one passage which might have been written among us to-day. Every word of it applies to the rebellion of which the leaders call their Government—a rebellion which airy jesters excuse with a joke, and complacent demagogues palliate with flattery:

"We may likewise consider rebellion as a greater complication of wickedness than any other crime we can commit. [Addison in the same paper justifies revolution by the very argument used by Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence.] It is big with rapine, sacrilege, and murder. It is dreadful in its mildest attempts, as it improvidates the public; ruins particular families; begets and perpetrates hatred among fellow-subjects, friends, and relations; makes a country the seat of war and desolation, and exposes it to the attempts of its foreign enemies. In short, as it is impossible for it to take effect, or to make the smallest progress but through a continued course of violence and bloodshed, a robber or a murderer is like an innocent man when we compare him with a rebel."

A LITTLE SENSE.

IF a pirate were sailing in a dark night along a dangerous channel, and you wanted him to run on the rocks and be wrecked, you would not carry out treaties and show the rocks, and bulls, "Look out, here's a beacon! Don't run into it!" would you? If he escaped, and sailed and ravaged and ruined the country, you couldn't say, "I didn't help him," could you?

These are the questions that must inevitably occur to every man who sees the frankness with which information, that should be secret, is printed in the papers. Within a week we have had a careful statement of the condition and prospects, and probable time of evolution, of our ironclad ship; and an announcement of the intended sailing of transports with troops into the very course of the Alabama; and details of intended movements of the army in Virginia; and of the projects of General Banks. And we have always done this, knowing that every paper is read in Richmond within four days.

Of course we are told that it is not the papers which carry the news. Yes; and it may be the chart in his pocket that carries the pirate through. But your torch helps wonderfully, my good friend. And we are told that, if the Government allows it, it's all right. Yes; but your paper in the same issue accuses the Government of stupidity. And we are told that if Tom and Dick don't print it Harry will. Yes; but because Tom and Dick are foolish, or infidelious, is we wrote, are you so? Is may be that the ship is so leaky that she must sink. But shall we, therefore, not try to stop the leak?

It is the duty of every loyal editor to take care that nothing in his paper shall in any way give information to the enemy, whether other papers do or not, and whether the Government cares about it or not. Can not Patriotism do what Despotism certainly would? Let the rebels find out if they can. Don't let us assume that they will, and therefore tell every thing we know.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

REMOVAL OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

AN official order releasing General M'Clellan from the command of the army was received at head-quarters on the 7th inst., and delivered to Assistant Adjutant-General Buckingham in person. General M'Clellan immediately left Harrison's Landing, and, transferring the command to General Burnside, and taking with him several of the men who had fought and suffered by his side, proceeded through his late line of campaign. General M'Clellan is ordered to report at Trenton, New Jersey.

THE REASON WHY.

A letter from General Halleck, dated October 28, has been published, giving the reasons for M'Clellan's removal. He states:

Third—Soon after the battle of Antietam General M'Clellan was urgently asked the reenrollment of his demoralized command, in order that, if he moved between the enemy and Washington, reinforcements could be sent from the place. On the 14 of October, finding that he purposed to operate on the line of the Potomac, I felt it to be necessary to compel him to give battle to the enemy, or drive him out of the advantages of delaying till the reenrollment could be completed. The Potomac was forded the night of the 15th of October he was peremptorily ordered to "cross the Potomac and give battle to the enemy, or drive him south." The army must move now while the roads are good." It will be remembered these words have elicited much criticism at the time.

Fourth—In my opinion there has been no such want of supplies in the army under General M'Clellan as to prevent his offensive movements in order to attack or operate the enemy. Had he moved to the south side of the Potomac he could have received his supplies almost as readily as by remaining inactive on the north.

Fifth—I am aware that General M'Clellan's reputation have been compiled with.

RESIGNS HIS COMMAND.

The following order was issued by General Burnside on taking command of the army:

In accordance with General Orders No. 163, issued by the President of the United States, I hereby assume command of the Army of the Potomac. Patriotism and the exercise of the highest courage in the direction of this army, and the full and hearty co-operation of the officers and men, will, I hope, under the blessing of God, insure its success.

Having been a sharer of the privations and a witness of the bravery of the old Army of the Potomac in the Harrison campaign, and fully identified with them in their feelings of regret and return for General M'Clellan, entertained through a long and most friendly association with him, I feel that I am in a measure I assume command.

To the Ninth Army Corps, so long and intimately associated with me, I need say nothing. Our histories are identical.

With confidence for myself, but with a great confidence in the unswerving loyalty and determination of the gallant army now intrusted to my care, I accept its control with the steadfast assurance that the same must prevail.

A. E. BURNSIDE,
Major-General Commanding

M'CLELLAN'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
CAMP PITCHER, NEAR TRENTON, N. J., Nov. 9, 1862.

Officers and Soldiers of the Army of the Potomac:

An order has been received relieving me from my command. Darnside the command of this army.

In parting from you I can not express the love and gratitude I bear to you. As an army you have grown up under my care. In you I have never found doubt or coldness. The battles you have fought under my command will ever be dear to my memory. Around the fires of bivouac, achieved, our tactical merits and fatigues, the graves of our comrades, we have been brought by dangers, and shared common fortunes. Sometimes clouds and sickness have disabled—the strongest associations which can exist between men have existed between us. You have been to me more than friends—you have been as children. I shall ever be remembered in supporting the Constitution of the United States and the inviolability of its powers.

GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN,
Major-General United States Army.

STAND BY BURNSIDE.

Major-General M'Clellan and his personal staff left Warrenton at eleven o'clock on 11th. On reaching Warrenton Junction a salute was fired. The General and staff then went up in line, afterward broke ranks, when the soldiers gave three hearty cheers and many expressed their regret at leaving Gen. M'Clellan in response, would on the platform of the railroad depot. The train then moved off, amid the cheers of those left behind by one, and all shouted "Stand by Burnside."

To this there was a responsive and considerate response.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

All the dispatches from Virginia agree in the statement that the mind of the army is with General M'Clellan, and at least so far as to avoid a battle in the Shenandoah Valley. Hero-Commander of the army were established at Warrenton on 7th, which gives the token possession of by our columns on the day previous. The command A. P. Hill's command was at Warrenton on 5th, his command and Stuart's Cavalry, with Longstreet's corps, at Culpeper. Dispatches from Warrenton, on 9th, bring the important information that General Pleasonton had a skirmish on 8th, near Little Washington, with Stuart's Cavalry, in which General Stuart was driven back, losing a gun. General Pleasonton, on the same day, occupied and now holds the railroad bridge over the Rappahannock. The structure being uninjured. The rebels retreat from Sperryville from had been destroyed by the rebels. The bridge is now in charge of a regiment of Sickles's brigade. The army is moving at once completely within our control, it can be put in position upon the line of the Rappahannock in three days.

It is said that Stonewall Jackson's whole column is at Front Royal, with a large force of cavalry, and has also six guns still remaining in the Shenandoah valley.

The rebels, it is said, have a large force of cavalry, and infantry, made an attack, on the 10th, upon General Pleasonton at Little Washington, commanded by General Wilcox's command were at once pushed forward to support Pleasonton, but had no infantry and were compelled to fall back, and having joined him, drove the rebels back. General Wilcox's command then returned upon the town of Jefferson and occupied it.

THE FIELD.

General Hooker takes command of General Fitz John Porter's corps. General Porter is relieved from the command to answer charges preferred against him by General Pope.

ASSENT OFFICERS TO JOIN THE ARMY.

Major-General Halleck has issued an order that all officers of volunteers, who have been absent from the Army of Potomac, shall proceed to join their respective commands within twenty days from the date hereof, or the disobedience of this order will be dismissed from service.

GENERAL SHERMAN AT NASHVILLE.

General Sherman and staff arrived at Nashville on 10th, leaving 5th Division under the command of Brigadier-Gen Mitchell-ville, making the remainder of the trip, forty miles, on horseback, without interruption or incident. The forces are blazing along the greater portion of the route, and many houses have been destroyed. The country looks gloriously desolate, inhabitants, forage, and stock being all gone.

THE HARPER'S FERRY SURRENDER.

The investigation of the Harper's Ferry surrender has been brought to a close, and the report of the Court has been acted upon. The results is the dismissal from the United States service of Colonel Dixon S. Miles, commanding Harper's Ferry, and Colonel Thomas H. Ford, Eighty-Second, and of Major Buell, of the One Hundred and Twenty-sixth New York Volunteers. The Commissioners, Colonel Julius Wahle receives the approbation of the Commission.

THE REBEL ARMY.

Our new from Richmond is dated to up to the 8th inst. General Lee had arrived there two weeks ago, and is said to be still there, acting as Commander-in-Chief and military adviser to the War Department. The active command of the army is left in the hands of Generals Longstreet and Jackson, the latter having his quarters at Culpepper. The Merrimac No. 2 is completed, and now lies below Fort Darling ready for mischief at the mouth of the James River.

ANOTHER SECRET EXPEDITION.

An expedition consisting of 12,000 men and several gunboats left Newbern, North Carolina, by land and water, on the 13th inst., under command of General Foster. Where it has gone to has not yet been made known.

ENGLAND.

MR. GLADSTONE EXPLAINS.

The following letter, signed by Mr. Gladstone's secretary, has been published:

Mr. Gladstone holds himself fully responsible for having declared his opinion at Leith nine months ago, to the effect that the Federal States have not succeeded, and cannot the struggle on the part of the Northern States was commenced with the view of establishing the fact of their having subjugated which has been formed under Mr. Jefferson Davis has shown itself to be sufficiently supplied with the common sense which makes a nation, and with the will and power to defend its independent existence. He can not, however, be responsible for the inferences, from your letter, you appear to have drawn from his statements—the more so, as they might, he thinks, have been left without attention to other portions of his declarations concerning America on the same occasion, he refrained from to step that might, under considerable circumstances, be likely to be injurious to the interests of England, and desires me to remark that to form opinions upon questions of policy, in reference to other countries, and to state it to a party to taking any of the steps necessary for giving them effect, are two distinct things, though connected together, are by no means identical, which may be separated by lapse of time and longer or shorter, according to the particular circumstances of the time.

MORE REBEL VESSELS BUILDING.

A London correspondent of the Boston Commercial Bulletin writes that it is well you are not completing a fleet of "Monitors." You are likely to need them before long. Workmen are employed night and day on Mersey-side, the Clyde, and elsewhere, in building some 30 iron-clads, for which are to be armed with the most powerful guns. They are intended to carry vessels into Southern ports. This I know to be a fact. My information is direct from those in connection with the premises.

GREECE.

ABDICATION OF THE KING.

KING Otho, of Greece, abdicated his throne on the 26th of October in favor of his brother. This step was forced on his Majesty by a revolution, which commenced in Western Greece and spread rapidly, the revolutionists organizing a provisional government at Patras, of which the statesman MAVROCORDATO is President.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. A. R. Waud sends us two sketches of the Advance of the Army of the Potomac into Virginia, which we reproduce on pages 740 and 741.

THE REMOVAL OF M'CLELLAN.

On 10th, after the receipt of the order removing Gen. M'Clellan, the General and his Staff, accompanied by General Burnside, bade farewell to the army, visiting in succession several army corps. As the General rode through the ranks, the torn and tattered banners of the veteran regiments were dipped to greet him, while the thousands of soldiers gave vent in continuous rounds of cheers and applause to their feelings.

At nine o'clock last evening all the officers belonging to head-quarters assembled at the General's tent to bid him farewell. The only toast given was by General M'Clellan:

"The Army of the Potomac!"

SKIRMISH IN THE VALLEY.

At daybreak on the 30th the cavalry, scouting up the valley, succeeded in capturing several of the enemy's men. It was foggy, and the advance of our men was undiscovered till they were right on the rebels, who skedaddled with a loss of six or seven men.

THE GALLOWS.

On Monday, October 20, Catharine Wilson met a doom as righteous as human law ever inflicted on a criminal whose deeds quite equal the atrocities of any malefactor on record. From the age of fourteen to that of forty-three her career was one of undeviating yet complex vice. It sometimes happens that great crimes are exhaustive and exclusive in their character, and that breaches of the seventh commandment are not compatible with sins against the sixth and eighth. Not so with Catharine Wilson. She was as foul in life as bloody in hand, and she seems not to have spared the poison draught even to the partners of her adultery and sensuality. Hers was an undeviating career of the foulest personal vices and the most cold-blooded and systematic murders, as well as deliberate and treacherous robberies. We speak without hesitation of her crimes as plural, because, adopting the language of Mr. Justice Byles with reference to the death of Mrs. Soames, we not only "never heard of a case in which it was more clearly proved that murder had been committed, and where the excruciating pain and agony of the victim were watched with so much deliberation by the murderer," but also because the same high judicial authority, having access to the depositions in another case, pronounced, in words of unexampled gravity and significance, "that he had no more doubt but that Mrs. Atkinson was also murdered by Catharine Wilson than if he had seen the crime committed with his own eyes." Nor did these two murders comprise the catalogue of her crimes. That she, who poisoned her paramour Mawer, again poisoned a second lover, one Dixon, robbed and poisoned Mrs. Jackson, attempted the life of a third paramour named Taylor, and administered sulphuric acid to a woman in whose house she was a lodger, only in the present year—of all this there seems to be no reasonable doubt, though these several cases have received no regular criminal inquiry. Seven murders known, if not judicially proved, do not after all, perhaps, complete Catharine Wilson's evil career. And if any thing were wanted to add to the magnitude of these crimes it would be found, not only in the artful and devilish facility with which she slid herself into the confidence of the widow and the unprotected—not only in the slow, gradual way in which she first sucked out the substance of her victims before she administered, with fiendish coolness, the successive cups of death under the sacred character of friend and nurse—but in the atrocious malignity by which she sought to destroy the character and reputation of the poor creatures, and to fix the ignominy of suicide on the objects of her own robbery and murder.

To do public opinion only simple justice, even the fanatics of the Society for the Abolition of Capital Punishment scarcely raised a whisper or a murmur against this great criminal's execution. It was felt to be too ridiculous to urge any immunity from the gallows on the score of the criminal's sex. What has sex to do with the matter, except that in this particular case a man could not have committed the murders? It was only a woman, with a woman's arts, a woman's insinuating craft, a woman's admittance to sick rooms, and to the sacred confidences of her sisters, a woman's womanliness, that could have perpetrated this string of crimes. The unhappy precedent which was said to have been established in the case of Celestina Somner was, with general assent, on this occasion, reversed; and the Old Bailey, which for some fourteen years has not seen a woman hung (for Mrs. Manning was executed at Horsemonger Lane), once more witnessed a female execution. As to Catharine Wilson, she died as she lived. A canting letter, full of the usual perversions of Scripture language, has been published in her name, and it is a fair imitation of the morbid literature of the condemned cell; but while deficient in external proofs of genuineness, there is the strongest internal evidence against its authenticity. No other sign of feeling on her part is forthcoming. Bold, defiant, insolent, and hardened, she left the world with a lie in her mouth, and the load of a life of guilt which, according to all moral laws, had long since extinguished her conscience. Very properly, as it seems to us, she was not manipulated by the dextrous spiritual legerdemain of the charitable gentleman, Mr. Wright, "the prison-philanthropist," who has a mission to condemned convicts. The present Ordinary of Newgate seems to be a sensible person, and we have been spared the fictitious euthanasia and ecstatic experiences of a wholesale poisoner's morbid and unnatural penitence. She was not a penitent, she made no confession, and it was not to be expected that she should confess or profess the least sorrow for her crimes. The only thing recorded of her condemned cell is that, with a coarse and mendacious stupidity, she affected not to understand her sentence; and, without a friend or visitor, deserted alike by God and man, she died a felon's death, without even the sympathies of an Old Bailey mob.

In one quarter alone has an attempt been made to revive the vulgar platitudes against capital punishment. The newspapers generally described the scene of Monday morning, not always without the usual talk which is talked by penny-a-liners, but with a commendable sense of propriety. The Times, as in such matters it generally does, took the lead, in a report which was characterized by good sense and right feeling; and the regulation report, communicated generally to the other papers, only sinned in the grandiloquence of its style and the impenetrable obscurity and recondite difficulty of its allusions. Fine writing, however, is a venial sin when measured against indecent misrepresentation of facts and a studied insult to common sense. We can pardon the writer, paid by the number of his sentences and the minuteness of his report, who talked of female executions as resembling angels' visits, because they were few and far between, in consideration of the information—new, we own, to ourselves—that it was formerly the custom, not only to preach condemned sermons, but to place a halter in the felon's pew and a coffin in the aisle of Newgate Chapel, during the service of the Sunday preceding a hanging day. Nor are we much disposed to quarrel with the same ingenious scribe's vivid description of the crowd before the gallows, in which we are informed that "the few respectable people present were as waifs and spars on the strong tide that rolled and surged against the prison walls, the mere flotsam and jetsam of that vast sea of scoundrelism." Indeed, we rather admire his discrimination which identified all the boys present with those "miniature masses of rags, dirt, vice, and ignorant cunning, who, to the disgrace of our police, imperil their own poor lives by turning heels over head for the delectation of boobies who fling them half-pence from the tops of omnibuses;" and we appreciate that very fine sentence which describes the "roar of the crowd, and the shrill laughs and snatches of song which broke now and then on the hoarse diapason of blasphemous ribaldry." This is mere fine talk, written with an eye to the inch measure of the sub-editor. Nor are we much moved to criticise another fine writer's description of the war of the elements, which, throughout the night before the execution, seemed to be in horrid harmony with the approaching tragedy. The entrance of the gallows—of course "the fatal machine"—is rendered, as art-critics say, with a considerable subtlety, as, in the darkness and grimness of three o'clock on a stormy morning, the "hideous apparatus of death, well fitted to strike terror into the most savage heart, is brought out with a horrid rumbling sound." We accompany, with a dim sense of some sort of meaning, the same famous hand, when he describes "the death-bell and its low solemn cadences stealing over the crowd and the criminal herself;" and just as Macaulay describes the beacon-lights streaming from Eddystone to John of Groat's, so with tolerable patience we endure to be informed how "from Southwark and Lambeth thousands came trooping over Blackfriars Bridge, while Bermondsey sent its multitudes over London Bridge, and Saffron Hill and the Seven Dials sent their eager reinforcements, till, joining the stream from Whitechapel, an impetuous and seemingly endless torrent, through Barbican and Smithfield, was absorbed in the great lake by which the gallows was encircled." But when we come to the closer touches of the tragic artist we own that we are lost. Mrs. Wilson, we are told, was dressed "in a light morning gown." The scene is the press-room, from which, we believe, the reporters are very properly excluded. What, therefore, is left but an opportunity for meditation? "It was an awful thought, while looking at her, that all the minute circumstances which impressed the spectators in that sad chamber were, at the same time, fixing their objects on the tablet of her mind—so quickly to be shattered and cast into oblivion." The fact that circumstances were fixing their objects on a mental tablet is certainly an awful thought to a psychologist. But the reporter in the Daily Telegraph, to whom we are indebted for this meditation, has something "more to tell, which may require possibly an effort of moral courage." Here are his own words:

> It is, however, in all its grotesque horror that we would present this scene to our readers; nor can we think it prudent, or in any way desirable, that a single touch of its character should be softened down. Our words, we know, will cause a shudder through all England. Be it so. England has sometimes need to shudder and turn pale at truths within the ken of her current history. When Catharine Wilson stood pinioned in her long, loose gown on that ghastly stage—when the hangman fastened a cord or strap round the skirt of her dress, a little below the knee, so as to keep the folds together and to prevent her struggling in the last agony—when he drew a long white cap over her head, the mob at once saw, recognized, and laughed at an image exactly resembling a figure with which the walls and boardings of London are placarded. It was a low, stifled laugh, that ran through the brutal concourse; and in the tone of its deep cynicism there was, as we fancied, a rough, harsh kind of pity.

Œdipus help us! What does this mean? If it means that when Catharine Wilson was standing, strapped and pinioned, below the gallows, she looked like that queer figure which is called "the Cure," we can only say that to inform us of this odd likeness is a matter of very bad taste, and shows to what degradation sensation writers will stoop; but it is not a piece of information which will "cause a shudder throughout England." On the contrary, just as the fact of Mrs. Manning being hung in black satin sent satin out of fashion from that day to this, so let us hope that Mrs. Wilson's hanging may discredit the absurd "Cure" popularity.

But all this is venial enough when contrasted with an article, "Another Account," furnished to the Morning Star. This is written by a very deep thinker and philosopher indeed—no ordinary penny-a-liner—but a "real man," as they say, an "earnest man," who tries very hard to unite the manner of Carlyle with the matter of Dickens. He scoffs at the notion—whose notion is it?—that the hangman is a great moral teacher, and he classes among "the shams and unveracities" the view that capital punishment is a lesson to crime. In more ways than one this public instructor in the Morning Star is a curiosity. He is the only man in England who thinks—only he does not think, but merely affects to think—that "the grounds on which Catharine Wilson has been elevated to the position of a modern Brinvilliers are questionable;" and he goes so far as to say that her brazen impudence in the prison and on the scaffold "was the theme of general admiration." Further, he calls us to remember the case of Eliza Fenning, who certainly was executed an innocent woman, and he talks of "a poison panic." That is to say, there is one writer who has the insolence to say, or rather to hint, that Catharine Wilson was probably innocent, and has been sacrificed by an unjust judge and a terrified jury to a popular panic on the subject of secret poisoning. His argument is the old stale one of Mr. Charles Dickens. Capital punishments are wrong, because they do not appear profitably to affect the mob present at an execution; and by way of "The Moral," the Morning Star appends to this narrative of Catharine Wilson's execution the Police Report which announces that two persons were brought before Alderman Mechi, charged with picking pockets at the Old Bailey, at the very foot of the gallows. It is almost as absurd to refute this argument as to urge it. As though, wherever there was a crowd, there would not be pickpockets; and as though it would not be quite as reasonable to argue the duty of prohibiting Confirmations at Church, a coronation, or one of Mr. Bright's Manchester meetings, because they, too, were attended by pickpockets. But, further, the argument is, that people who witness an execution are not deterred from crime, because, while the drop is falling, they play all sorts of tricks, and indulge in loose and drunken demeanor. But where is the necessary connection between the two things? Who knows whether and when a coarse and brutal nature is or is not seriously affected? A costermonger may joke at the gallows; but it may affect him seriously, nevertheless. It does not follow that a man is not frightened, because he grins and plays the fool. An incipient murderer may, for aught Mr. Dickens knows, be warned off a coming crime, even though he cuts lewd jokes at Calcraft and his moral lesson. But all this is beside the real question. We do not say that capital punishment is only didactic. It may be, and it very often is, a deterring instrument; and we do not deny that the gallows is a warning and terror to evil-doers. We believe that hanging does produce a serious effect, even on the wretched crowds who witness it. But capital punishment is more than a moral lesson, and more than all this. It is an exhibition, on the largest and most awful scale, of that divine justice the administration of which is intrusted to law.

THE PRINCE DE JOINVILLE ON M'CLELLAN.

In the current number of the Revue des Deux Mondes there is an article on the campaign of the Army of the Potomac, which is generally attributed to the Prince de Joinville, and bears abundant internal signs of its origin. The Prince de Joinville writes with a clearness, a force, and a moderation which have scarcely ever been brought to bear on the description of American affairs. He writes of military affairs with a professional knowledge and power of criticism, but with a simplicity and a lucidity for which civilians may be thankful.

The Prince is decidedly favorable to M'Clellan. He tells us that M'Clellan at first intended to attack directly in front, and that he only waited for the spring to advance. He knew quite well that the wooden cannon, which he was so much laughed at for not taking, were only made of wood, but he considered it scarcely worth while to take even wooden cannon unless he could advance beyond, and the state of the roads would not permit him. Before, however, the time came when an advance was possible, he learned that the Confederates had so completely destroyed the means of communication that he would have had to spend weeks in the mere construction of the road that was to take him toward Richmond, and feed him on his way. He therefore determined to take his army round by sea, and ascend the James River. He was beginning his preparations with the utmost secrecy, when he was ordered to Washington to attend a general council of war. The other generals present made various proposals, all, of course, based on the supposition that the army was to move by land southward. This forced M'Clellan to reveal that he did not propose to go that way at all, but to take his army round by sea. Immediately this was known, although only confided in this way to a few men of the highest position, a mysterious feminine influence conveyed it to the Confederates, and they had time to make those preparations at Yorktown and at various parts of the peninsula which threw so much difficulty subsequently in the way of the Federals. The Prince describes, with much beauty of language and liveliness of feeling, the incidents of the march, from the landing to the final position on the Chickahominy. M'Clellan's plan was, he thinks, quite right, and, according to all probability, the Federals ought to have won and taken Richmond; but several circumstances combined to baffle M'Clellan. We have, perhaps, heard of them all before, but still they have a certain novelty when presented for the first time by a competent and trust-worthy observer.

In the first place, there was the scandalous treachery in the Federal council-room, which revealed to the Confederates exactly what M'Clellan was going to do; and the consequence was that the Federal army had to force its way through a series of works and military lines, which although soon taken, yet cost, on the whole, a lamentable waste of the precious spring weather. In the next place, the summer was wet beyond all experience of Virginian summers. The army lived in a perpetual down-pour, and had to march through a vast flood. It was with the utmost difficulty that artillery could be moved on at all, and this made the approach all the more slow, the facility of concentrating an opposing Confederate force all the greater, and the sickness all the more terrible. Thirdly, the Merrimac, although kept from destroying the fleet or interfering with the landing of the troops by the presence of the Monitor, yet paralyzed the Federal gun-boats, and forced the army to march by land without the assistance it expected by water. Lastly, M'Clellan was not supported. He was left to himself, and denied reinforcements in a way which reflects the greatest disgrace on the Washington authorities. When he took up his station at the junction of the Chickahominy and the road to West Point, he could with the greatest ease have co-operated with M'Dowell, whose assistance would have been invaluable to him, and who was doing nothing where he was stationed, about thirty miles to the north of Richmond. But M'Dowell received express orders by telegraph from Washington not to help M'Clellan. The Prince thinks that the cause of this was a ridiculous fear that Washington was not quite safe, and a feeling that there was no knowing where the Confederates might turn up. The consequence was, that in the series of battles which followed M'Clellan was beaten by the superiority of the numbers of the Confederates, who gave up every thing in order to beat him. They succeeded; and he made his way to Harrison's Landing—the victim, according to the Prince, of bad weather, and of the miserable, incompetent, selfish, treacherous set who had got hold of the reins of power at Washington.

The Prince was, in some respects, highly pleased with the American army. Here, of course, he can not be over frank. He can not indulge in any very plain criticisms on the officers with whom he has lately been living, and who received him with kindness and respect. But he makes some general remarks. That the men fought on both sides with the greatest pluck has long ago been made known to the world by the frightful carnage which is the one result even of battles that have no other. The Prince was also greatly struck with the cheerfulness, and ease, and skill, with which the men set themselves to work at natural difficulties, the celerity with which they made clearings, the adroitness with which they constructed temporary roads, and moved heavy guns. But he was also much struck with a certain slowness and languor which they displayed when acting in large bodies. This even extended to the generals; and the Prince, though scarcely saying so in plain terms, evidently thinks that even M'Clellan was not quick enough, and lost opportunities which a commander who could have moved his troops more quickly might have seized. This the Prince attributes to the general habits of the people. They are accustomed to act for themselves, but not to act with each other; and the energy they show in pushing forward on their own account disappears when they come to pushing forward in a body. Perhaps we may gather that he does not consider the American army, as a whole, equal to that of a great Continental power. He was also much impressed with the odd coolness of the people in many respects. He mentions the embalmers, who freely comforted the army with the assurance that, for a very moderate price, a dead man might be sent home pickled, so that death lost half its sting. He also tells us that during the whole of one of the hottest battles of the Chickahominy newspaper-sellers went up and down the lines crying out the latest news from New York, and found purchasers for the journals they had to sell.

The Prince thinks that M'Clellan's expedition was the turning-point of the war. The Washington Government had it in their power to make the expedition, according to all human probability, completely successful. But they threw away their chance, and now the South stands on an equality with the North.

BLUE LIGHTNING.

O, the days when first I knew
The lightning blue
  Of that bright eye!
It smote me, yet it did not kill,
But with a loftier life did fill
  A life that could not die—
As then I thought: O, rapture rare,
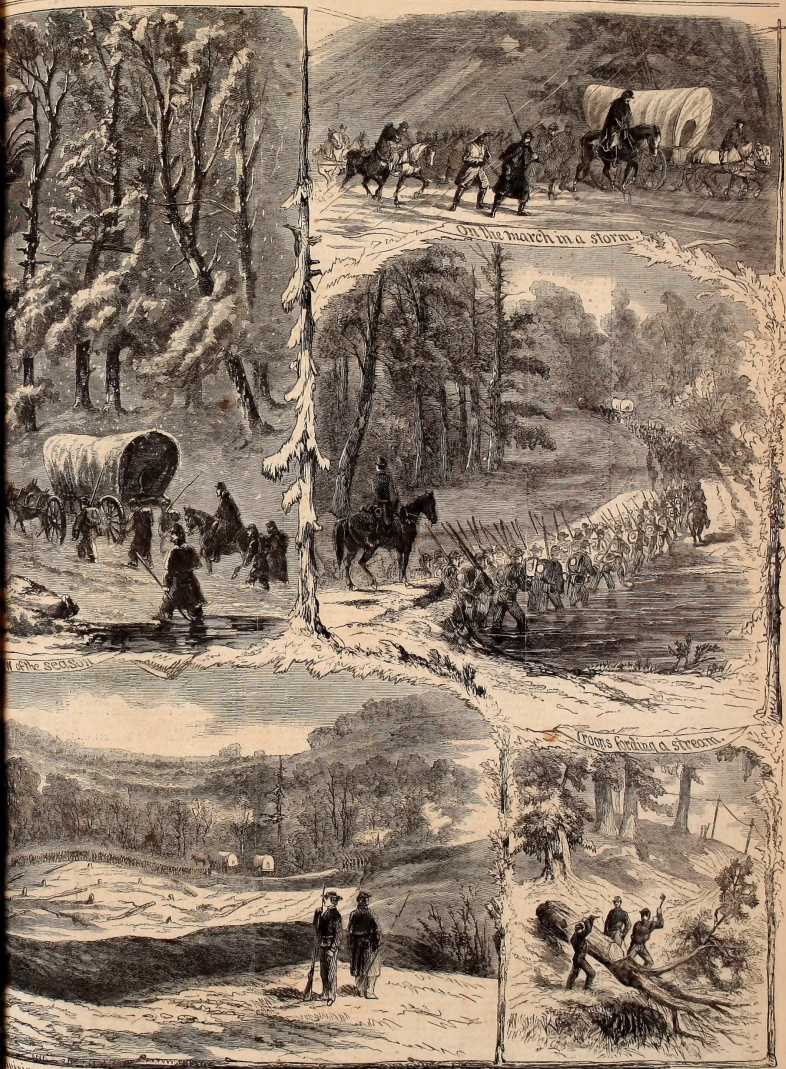
When I was fond, and she was fair!



O, the days when oft I knew
The honey dew
  Of that bright lip!
My bee-like kisses deeply sought
The rosy petals—nectar-fraught—
  Enchantment in each sip!
O, rapture wild! O, rapture rare!
When she was faithful, fond, and fair.

O, the fatal hour I knew
The lightning blue
  Was fraught with death—
The ice-bolt clove my heart in twain—
I think I ne'er can die again:
  For though I still have breath,
My life is naught since that cold gleam
Smote the warm fount and froze the stream.

O, the fatal hour I knew
The pallid hue
  Of lips once bright!
Love-laden lips of days gone by Bore poison now to bid me die,
  As, with a tremor slight,
They dropp'd the deadly words!—I knew
That I was wrong'd and she untrue.

THE ARMY OF THE OHIO ON THE M

Clearing the Road.

SKETCHED BY ME. H. MOSLER.—[SEE PAGE 746.]

THE ARMY OF THE OHIO.

We devote pages 744 and 745 to illustrations of the ARMY OF THE OHIO ON THE MARCH, from sketches by Mr. Henry Mosler. Of the centre picture Mr. M. writes:

"On 26th October we started from Mount Vernon toward Somerset on our way to Bowling Green. It had snowed all the day before, and the mountain road had become quite a mass of mud, in some places knee-deep. The scene, however, was very inspiring. The foliage was still green; autumn had not yet tinged the leaves with its gaudy colors, and it contrasted finely with the white sheet of snow which covered the ground. The trees and branches, heavily snow-laded, dropped gracefully toward the earth, and every now and then some great bough, too heavily freighted fell with a resounding crash. After a weary march of fifteen miles the troops encamped for the night about sundown, quite tired. You may fancy how they enjoyed the cold night, in their chilled, wet condition, sleeping in the open air.

"WILD CAT is a place where a battle was fought on the 21st October, 1861. In the foreground a regiment part of the earth-works thrown up at that time. The hills on the right, which are very high, command all the surrounding country. The scene is very picturesque, and in a military point of view I think the height is important.

"Another picture represents a MARCH IN THE RAIN. This scene is well impressed on my memory, as I got a good ducking, my clothes nearly being of no use whatever.

"THE CAMP OF THE ROAD OF THREE TREES was a daily operation on our march. The rear of Bragg's retreating army felled every tree which stood near enough the road to fall across it, and our advance column had to clear away the obstructions. We were often two days in a small distance, on account of the felling trees.

"The other pictures explain themselves."

AN ARM FOR A HEART.

ONE OF MR. MERCIER'S "evenings" was two thirds over. The lights now grew pale before the moon. Eyes sparkled, jewels flashed, silken trained glistened, flimsy laces shook either out upon the air. The dance seemed to languish; for it was only the February of '61, and people said to dance then —before there had been time turned into cash—classically, soldiers and mourners. Ethel Darricott was tired. She had been on the floor all the evening. She was glad to rest on her partner's arm, and stop for a moment to rest upon a sofa, in the recess formed by a bay window. The lights were screened just then, as it chanced, and it looked quiet and inviting—a little withdrawn from the confusion, and yet in sight all the big, gay, bright glitter and movement.

Miss Darricott had danced more than half the evening with this same partner—Edward Revere. He was a handsome, haughty, indolent man; young, still, scarcely twenty-six, indeed; quiet in his air of command, careless yet absolute, that made you think him a man who, in many things, must have lost yourself in a mist of speculation. He was tall and vigorous, with muscles that would have set the "strong man" envy with envy; and yet a lazy, nonchalant air, as if he would like some one to save him the trouble of lifting his own hand.

Miss Darricott was happy sitting there by his side, tired as she then almost was, with bright grasses and fair faces rushing madly in front of her. And, the dance music so merry that it was sad with its own sadness, and very soothing for the listener. They looked on for a while without speaking—then Miss Darricott said, musingly:

"A great many pretty faces, aren't there?"

"I suppose so. I was just wondering why none of them looked particularly pretty to me. I, however is it always so, Ethel—that when a man truly loves one he sees none defect in all others because they are not just like her?"

He had never called her Ethel before. It quickened her pulse, and set her head to ache, and not answer him because she did not know what to say. He did not notice, at least he went on speaking, slowly, but invulnerably as it was, through what would be said.

"I don't know why I tell you now, Ethel. I surely did not mean to when I made you sit down here; but I love you. I want you to be mine, my wife, by my side forever—if I can win her. And there is in my life. What does your heart say? Can you answer me?"

Miss Darricott did not speak for a little while. She was asking herself his question over again—as was only natural—what her heart answered she could share his destiny, be his wife. She grew pale a little before she answered, but her reply when it came, was firmly spoken—

"No."

Howard Revere turned and looked at her a moment—looked into her eyes and at her face, whose lineaments grew firm as her tone had done. He did not expostulate with her or entreat her. It would not have been like him. He only bowed.

"Will you favor me," he said, after a moment after, as a new set was forming. She put a cold hard hand in his, and they were again partners.

Miss Darricott had a cousin—a year older, a little less beautiful, but with a keen insight into men and things. She was an orphan, living with the family of her Uncle Darricott almost as a daughter. That night she two lingered over the fire in the little dressing-room between their two rooms and talked together as girls do after balls. Only Ethel was more silent than usual, and her cousin Grace watched her anxiously but furtively.

"Have you not lost something?" Grace inquired at length, with a covert meaning in her tone.

"No, I believe not," glancing at rings and bracelets.

"Lost was not a good word, perhaps. I mean have you not thrown away something to-night which you will want, and seek for vainly as the years go on?"

Ethel's eyes fell beneath the keen yet kindly glance which searched her face. Her cheeks colored. Her answer was a question scarcely to the point.

"How do you know every thing, Grace? How did you guess this?"

"I saw it all in pantomime. Words could not have been said that you did not hear at his. I was sorry, for I love you—love him."

"I fear I do. But that ask me then he is he only asked if I could. his wife."

"And you told his. I am sorry, for I do not think he will ever gain. If you love him why not marry him?"

"Because I feared I might top loving him some day. Now that he finds his love me. I could not do is bad enough. If offend him by my taste and my life is in this world, where so many harvest are waiting."

Grace looked at her cousin with changed expression.

"I thought I understood you, Ethel, and yet I should never have given you credit for such a reason. That you say is certainly right and true in the main, only I do not think it applies to Mr. Revere. There is a difference between an idle, aimless life, and one of waiting till one's right work comes."

"What makes you reckon Mr. Revere among the waiters?"

"Because it is not in his nature to like idleness or inaction. I can see that he is restive under it. But he is not fond of vain labor, of wasting strength. He has been waiting for some work that never came. Howard Revere's time will come, and his life will be one not to be compared by women like you and me. But it's useless talking now. It would not be like him ever to say over again what he said to-night."

Ethel Darricott waited to be questioned, but she was alone; but it was a miserable failure, and she gave up at last to the fact that her cousin knew her cousin's words disquieted her strangely. Had she indeed thrown away the one pure pearl Fate was ever likely to offer her in this world, and one glory never again gladden heart and eyes, though she should seek a place of repentance even with tears?

So it went on till the surrender of Sumter, and the call which summoned the whole North to arms. Among the first to volunteer his services was the man she had thought so fond of ease and self, so fearful of fatigue, so loyal to his own life. His name was enrolled as a private at first, but his company chose him unanimously for captain, and so Captain Revere led them on to the defence of Washington.

Before he left he called to bid Ethel good-by but other guests were in the drawing-room, and he did not see her alone. Only as he was leaving she stepped to the door with him, and he held her hand for a moment. Perhaps that touch conjured up the words to his lips. At any rate he said what he had not meant to say.

"You are sorry to see that I once hoped you would be, Ethel; but you are my friend, are you not? You will think of me sometimes, and be sorry for me a little if I fall?"

"You will not fall," Ethel said, resolutely, forcing back the tears that threatened to choke her. "I shall think of you sometimes, and pray for you. I shall welcome you, and be proud of my friend."

"If I do not return," he said, holding her hand as he turned away, "God bless you. I have not changed in my estimation of you because your heart would not answer to mine. Remember that."

He went away with those words, and then Ethel knew how she loved him.

The next day came—the soldiers were gone, and Ethel Darricott tried to take up cheerfully the tenant of life which was left to her. She had her books and the dearest she felt, was gone with him; but much remained, and she was not to be pitied. She was not more exacting of others than she was of herself. To have yielded idly to her grief would have been to fade as her lilies did. She was her father saw no change in her.

So the months went on—of no more than a year, even to the terrible six days of fighting before Richmond. In all this time Captain Revere had never been actually wounded, and he never had thought of duty. Other men took furlough—some on slight pretexts—went to their home; he never. Perhaps he felt that he had no true home, and so hope to lure him Northward, and so grew reckless of life. Miss Darricott read his name in the list the papers anxiously. She saw his name often where it was there should be, briefly value praised; and still he was unharmed. He was in the battle and in the ball was not yet cast which should work him ill. He was promoted, but he would not go to the rear, a sweet, scarcely recognized hope began to flutter its wings trustingly in her heart. Grace watched her with a kind of fear. He might come back yet, and say over again the words for which she had answered "no" so thoughtlessly.

But at last Fate and the Rebels were too strong for him. In the battle of Centreville he lost an arm, and was severely wounded besides in the head. The hospitals were full; and as soon as he could travel he was brought home. It was two months before he could walk at all, and then he was still weak. The air would help to recruit his exhausted energies, and so Grace and Ethel resigned him to it. Perhaps he went the more willingly because he knew that Miss Darricott had a summer cottage there, and in his secret heart he was conscious of a longing to see Ethel again. And yet Grace had been right when she divined that he would never ask a second time the question he had asked on that September night. The pride which prompted him to the same woman would have been to him a mortal impossibility. He hardly knew himself why he wanted to see her always. He only knew that he did.

He had been in Newport a week before he called on her. He had treated to meeting her first by some accident. But she was evidently very related. He concluded that fortune was not on his side; and as he really wanted to see her very much gave over waiting for lucky chances, and went there.

She was alone when his card was brought to her. She knew of his wound—knew what changes to expect in seeing him. She staid in her own room long enough to fortify herself, and make sure that she would betray no uncalled-for emotion. With face and manner schooled to mere friendliness she descended. Her self-command would have failed her as he came to meet her with halting step, and she saw the empty coat-sleeve hanging at his side. It was so pitiful to note the decay of that fine, vigorous, manly strength—to think of the good right arm which would never now be his.

"I am home for good now," he said, with an evident effort to bear himself cheerfully. "I am a helpless cripple-almost. I had no hope to be able to help on the good cause till it reached the triumphant end, and I am here."

"Then you have no doubts of the final result?" Ethel asked, forcing herself to speak, and knowing that she could not hurt her voice on any subject less general.

"Not a doubt! The great cause of human liberty is not to receive its death-blow in this land or this day. The world has been tending for centuries toward this culminating point. The battle is not between North and South merely, but between shoddy government, home and hell, honor, right and wrong. Our country is only the great battle-ground for the conflict of all the ages. We shall conquer. We must. God will not let us fail!"

Ethel's face kindled in response to his eager glance. Then she looked at his arm, and sighed as she said, softly,

"How much it costs!"

"We set small value, you know, on that which we do not buy dear," he answered, with that grand, free way that was his. "I think no price could be too great to pay. I would have given life at cheerfully as I did that limb; but then God saw fit so much to say for a man who has no ties to make life precious."

"Would you have staid at home if I had answered you differently that night?"

Ethel never could tell how she came to ask this question. The words seemed to utter themselves without her volition. She could have bitten her tongue off for uttering them a moment after.

He looked at her, a little surprised perhaps, yet not displeased, for the kindness of his smile did not change, as he answered, in almost tender tone to her replied,

"No, I should not have staid at home even in that case. Duty is duty just as much when a man has every thing to make it hard to do it, as when any great disappointment makes all sacrifices easy."

And yet I might not have been so fearless in the field, so ready to risk my life, if there was one at home whose heart and life were linked to indissolubly to mine—who knows?

Ethel, with her own heart words mutingly, as if more to himself than her. Embarrassed beyond expression she made no reply to his question. She did not know how to take up the conversation. Just then her cousin Grace came in, and made her task easy. Never was interruption more welcome.

After that they met often; but the old subject was not again hinted at between them. Now, however, something like intimacy seemed likely to be springing up between Captain Revere and her cousin Grace. It was not love on his part, or a bitter pang, but she conquered it bravely—conquered it so entirely that she was able to love Grace in return, and to be tenderly sight and unconscious, as she had done ever since she was a little child. They were not such a woman, with a proud weak, defenseless heart, and sometimes it ached with a keen, sharp pain when she saw Grace drive with Captain Revere's wife, in the low, open carriage, going carriage in which he passed hours of every day upon the beach.

In one of these drives Captain Revere surprised his companion by saying, with a quiver of pain in his voice,

"Grace, if I were not the miserable cripple that I am, I should ask you to love me; but I should not do it without telling you how dear I once held your cousin Ethel."

Grace answered fairly tremblel. She had never dreamed of this. She had grown so intimate with him that only for Ethel's sake, in order that a time might come when he could honorably and delicately let him know the state of her cousin's heart. Miss Darricott was the dearest friend she possessed. And yet—poor human nature—she was tempted for just one sorrowful moment. Howard Revere was a prize for the embodiment of almost every desirable conception of manhood. A thrill of trouble flew at his words, and left her easy it would be to love him. For a moment her heart panted after this bliss beyond her hopes, adorned with all the graces of a life that had been so long denied her during years. Then resolutely she put from her the cup he had no right to taste, and saved the sweet draught for another. Her voice, when she spoke, was as calm as if she had passed through no perilous ordeal of temptation.

"You know women very slightly, Captain Revere, if you think it possible that one who loved you would love you all the better, esteem it all the more an honor to be your wife, because of what the world would recognize as a sacrifice on your part. But, pardon me, I think you ought not to use the past tense in speaking of Ethel. You must believe that it is dead, any more than is her love for you."

"Ethel! Her love for me! You do not mean that she ever loved me?"

He spoke with a changed manner, a wild, glad eagerness, which would have angered poorly for Grace's hopes of happiness with him had she been a woman of that sort. But she was easy now, and now, in kindling glance and earnest tone, when he loved—whom he would always love. Grace smiled—most women can when a heartache lies underneath.

"Yes, I am sure. She would not like it, perhaps at present she would not forgive it, if she dreamed that I had let you know; but I can not think two lives ought to be sacrificed to the delicate scruples of maidenly pride. Ethel does love you. She loved you all the time."

"And yet," he said with a puzzled tone, as if it all seemed a mystery beyond his solving, "she certainly refused me."

That was because of some Quixotic notions of hers. She thought then that you were an idler in the vineyard, with little or no earnest purpose, and she hesitated to ally her life with yours lest both might be a failure. It was only that she did not quite understand you then as she knew you to the war she began to see you in a new light. If you had asked her the same question that day she would have said no."

Captain Revere turned a face over which the years of a new day had not broken to his companion.

"I can not thank you fitly," he said. "You knew me better than I knew myself when you told me that day for Ethel was not dead. And yet I thought I had conquered it. I took her so fully at her word that night. If she had cared for me then, I thought she never would—I have never cherished any shadow of hope since."

It was at quiet sunset when they reached home. Ethel was in the yard, just returned from a walk.

"Come with me at this sunset, will you not?" Captain Revere asked in a tone which seemed to take her compliance for granted. She was tempted to say "No," but the sheer cowardice of it she reflected that she should be punishing herself as well as him. Her style clouds were turning to flame; the sea was crimson, like air balm. Why should she not enjoy it all with him—her friend—as he had said?

She stepped into the low carriage by his side and they rolled away. Soon he gave her the rein as he was tired of driving, he said, leaning back, as if enjoying the luxurious ease of his position, with a swift motion of his head. Ethel obeyed. He was silent for a time. After a while he began talking to her—told her as he had never talked before of his plans for the use of his future life, of the ambition that he loved her cousin—forget pride and woman-ly scruples—forget herself, and thought only of comforting him.

"Would the heart you once asked for be say dependent on the enlightened, let one so low that he could scarcely hear them.

His face kindled.

"Ethel, will you speak? It could make life rich beyond asking or hoping. I would pay me with all the love of my heart."

"Then I will tell you, Howard; I loved you then and ever since."

Was ever sunset like that sunset? Did ever waves break upon the strand with such a summer song, such passion of melody and joy? Let what words could remember they could not feel the memory. They had lived because they had loved.

When they reached home Ethel found her cousin waiting for her in her own rooms. She did not know then—she never will know—the agency that cousin had had in inspiring about the change of her life. She told her secret in a tone of gentle pride:

"Grace, I am engaged to Captain Revere."

"Indeed! Then I suppose you set me down as a false prophet. I thought he would never ask you again."

Ethel blushed a little.

"I believe he did. I am glad it was I who asked him."

The kiss of congratulation which Grace pressed upon the blushing cheek raised to hers was not the less warm and true because of some silent tears she had wept that night, as she sat looking outward to the sea and the sunset—tears which only God saw.

MIZPAH.

MRS. DAYTA locked up from the alabaster shell that she was filling with fuschias.

"I think," she said, in her soft, deliberate way, "that Mr. Mainwaring is quite right. If I had a daughter who refused the position for which I had been educating her, my shrewd penetration, and love of fancying the man who offered it, I should most decidedly disinherit her. I should not have left her a full liberty to act out her romantic notions unhindered by me!" at which Douglas Enfield-Jones, who was lounging in the window, sighed, as one sighing with an ominous sparkle under his downcast lashes.

Matters were thus:

Four years ago Mrs. Dayta brought home Mar-Jones, Esq., a widower. Mrs. Dayta, impressively styled it a widow, for Widow, be it known, is a certain attribute which, when once affixed modestly to the lap of parvenus, but Widow is a thing of birth and breeding. Society allows it only to those who have the right to claim it. Mrs. Dayta had been a Peyton, was connected with the Masters and Pendletons, John Randolph with a handful of respectability, she could afford to keep a widow and parade it. The care had been thrown from the track and she stranded at a country inn; heard there of a forgotten fossil cousin; saw at her house her daughter, Margaret Peyton Jones, and said to herself, "Here is atrocious, your hair and your manner worse; but you are a very handsome girl, and if you will come with me I will make you Peyton Jones!" Ambition and hesitation, each for all in triumph.

Mr. Dayta was recently dead. Grief was due to Margaret must commence the developing process; or Mrs. Dayta took her to Rome, spent four years at Mrs. Dayta took her to Rome, spent four years between there and Venice—for she was to be nurse, the considered haste the sign-manual of weakness, "his mark. During those years Margaret's mother died and her father took a second wife—a Virginia gal, shrewish woman; from that time Bagdad would have been as eligible an abiding place in her thoughts as the happy farm-house in Virginia; and Sweet Air, Mrs. Dayta's country seat, where they quietly settled on their return, became as much her home as pleasant a one that she rarely thought of the cloud, no larger than a man's hand, on her horizon—her other dependence and isolation.

There had been two days of pitiless fog and drizzle, borrowed of November, with no hope of clearing till late in the afternoon, when a cold plum should appear in the hills, followed by a flash and sparkle of sunshine, a sudden blaze of the sun low down in the west, and a rosy sunset that all clouds, burning fiercely at their ragged edges, refl, broken through by long quivering gleams of brightness, darter than scarlet, deeper than gold; in its turn caught, subsumed, swept away in the purple rout toward the sea, or tossed high beyond, and heaven, bursting out in rosy flushes through the tangle and the flattering of the trees; and Margaret, wrapped in a cloak and hood, watching it all from the crumbling bank overlooking the river.

She was not too pleased to hear some one coming down the road, as sounded like Rosecoe Baring's step; if so, it must be Locius Marvin, familiarly known as "Lucy." Had he not been, he would have asked the most! It proved, however, to be Douglas Erfot. What next him there? She had thought him a fixture near Mrs. Dayta.

He came and stood beside her silently and reverently till the glory was quite passed away.

"Thank you," said Margaret, turning around. "I know no one else who would have had so much sense. Only the world would have hindered you from breaking in on the divine service that has been going on."

Douglas smiled at her, not with his lips but out of the depths of a remarkable pair of blue eyes—an assured quiet irrelevancy.

"You must come in. This what is to cool for you."

"On the contrary I am thawing out. When I came out I was a petrifaction of disgust. The waters of solitude have been dripping on me for the past two days, and every good and pleasant feeling is nearly turned into stone."

"I'm sorry for that."

"You know nothing at all about it. You are all day with your books, and your boys, and your fun. The quiet that is stagnation to me is rest to you. The tree that has been running its thorns into me all day shoots out its blushes. Mrs. Dayta, I see you are tired, you can play billiards, smoke your cigar, and forget all about it in your delectable stupor, though I protest I had rather bear it than the nonsense about Ada Pentelow and her diamonds, and Miss Maud Wilkins's hair, Dewdall's horsekeeping, her rouge, and her d'Abonçon shawl. I was interested in neither thousand-dollar Parisian dresses nor better Selina's aunt was Miss Eustman or Miss Peetman. I like none of these things."

"You need not let them injure you."

"Que faire? It is all our life. Dressing, driving, gossiping, with such dreary variations as Lucy's. I say now, Miss Margaret, am I to come in for Rosco Baring's 'A person of your fine mind can not but appreciate, etc.'"

Margaret mimicked tone and manner with precision. Douglas looked astonished.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Margaret. I have always thought you were trying to decide which of those two gentlemen is the most bearable."

Margaret's cheeks flamed even in the darkness, but she answered, half-defiantly,

"Well, could I do better?"

"Yes, if you dare."

They were silent upon the hearing of time then to ask his meaning even if she had wished. In the drawing-room the people were all gathered about the fire, and their entrance was hailed with a shout.

Douglas sat down by Margaret in the shadow.

"Dare you?" he asked, as if in continuation of their conversation.

Dare I what?"

Douglas leaned one sup in their faces. Mrs. Dayta had quietly lighted a lamp swinging near them and stood examining them.

"Did you ever have a pleasant walk?" he asked.

"We had no walk at all. I found Miss Margaret shivering on the bank, and brought her in."

"Most grandmotherly of you! But seriously, Margaret, you look as if you were thoroughly chilled, or as over by the day, my love."

Margaret went over to the hearth, and stood there holding up a little white hand to the rising blaze, and looking into it with dreaming eyes, listening perhaps to the wind beating up against the broad front of the house, and gathering in the chimney.

"What are you thinking of?" asked Rosco Baring, who had been watching her. "You look miserable, what the Scotch call 'raised.' Did you see a spirit in your travels?"

"I don't know—perhaps."

"Your destiny, of course."

Margaret started. Groping in the dark Rosco had struck full at what in her mind was a most unmanageable idea.

"A destiny!" she answered, with spirit. "I doubt if it will be mine. I don't like it."

"Ah!"

It was Mrs. Dayta exclaiming as she came out of the room. In walking about the billiard-table she had struck her little jeweled back-comb against a bracket, or caught her braid in it, or, at any rate, there it was, all down around her, her pretty, hair, longer even than Margaret's, of that lovely brown that here and there takes on a rich reddish gold, and what with gossamer sleeves falling away from her handsome arms as she put it back, and the white gleaming of little bands in the soft-clinging mass, and the sparkle of diamonds catching the light, making a very pretty picture for all whom it might concern.—Mr. Erfot, for instance. Perhaps Margaret did; that's likely. At any rate she turned her back, brought out from a blue silk nest a thimble, which, if thimbles can feel, must have been not a little astonished at its unusual perch on her finger, and sewed savagely all the evening, not even stopping for coffee; but after a while a well-shaped masculine hand, on which sparkled a superb diamond ring, set down a tiny cup before her, and Douglas Erfot sat down at her ear.

"Miss Margaret, listen to this apropos of our conversation: '' Suffering and sacrifice is the price of truth and good.' Roads stone easily downward, and climb painfully upward. Think of all come to a ditch awaits you; the other winds into the very rose and sunlight of happiness.' "

"Whose writing is that?" asked Margaret, looking up in surprise, but dropping her eyes the instant after under the sarcastic, mocking, and crimsoning to the temples at her own simplicity!

While Mrs. Dayta, watching them with jealous, wrathful eyes over her coffee-cup, cried out, like Athalaih, "treason" in her heart.

It was at this moment that she had favored them with the declaration with which we commence a confidential conversation, and communicated to the fate chosen for her by Mrs. Dayta in the person of Locius, or Rosco Baring, just awakened to the possibility of something half alluring from the struggle, wholly uncertain of the strength, and like stone they left Sweet Air for their usual winter's stay in town.

Douglas came daily, so did Rosco and Locius; and the latter, as a matter of course, would have Mrs. Erfot, and that Margaret was coquetting, omitting the gentle shout "two steals," etc., and nearing the truth as closely as usual.

Came that memorable 13th of April, the rising of the North, the first half-dull, half-startling phenomenon among them, enlisting as a private, and Douglas Erfot, Douglas Erfot. When they heard of it, Margaret and Mrs. Dayta both grew white, looked at each other stealthily, saw only a blank, and resigned themselves to wait as only women can.

It was the evening before Douglas's going, March, and the two ladies were sitting out in the drawing-room, airy flutterings, whisperings, and half-stirrings every now and then, showing the turning hearts of brazen flowers, or streaming moonlike from alabaster globes, pale honey-suckles hanging from graceful vases, and myrtle wreaths, yellow fuschias, purple and golden leaved passies interwoven in their hair, swinging in baskets of cool moss from the walls, Mrs. Dayta in a dark watchful, Margaret starting at every new arrival, and looking up with a flush that died out in pain, his found them. He was nervous too in his way, but could not be hindered by the crowd, he would not be detained by Mrs. Dayta, he had come through it all like Saladin's sword, and as if by instinct found Margaret's hand, and held it for the instant. She tried hard for composure, but her cheeks would burn, her voice would tremble.

"How long will you be away?" Mrs. Dayta was not coming at all."

"You could never have believed that—besides I am not the latest. I see Rosco and Lucy are not here."

"I don't think they will hence us."

Something in Margaret's tone made him start, look earnestly at her cheeks, then smile.

"You have done it, then."

"Done what? How malicious you look! I have told you nothing."

Douglas put such trifling on one side with a wave of his hand:

"I am serious now. What will Mrs. Dayta say?"

"How can I tell? You heard her the other morning. She declared to rally, that I have cowed the cost. I have the instincts of my race—I love all that is looking about her) with passion even. The bright colors, the sun, the air, the luxury, even the winding of the stairs are to me hourly pleasure; I feel as one just let out of a cage, and that my squalid life better than disgust and death in life, with Rosco Baring or Lucy. Once I thought it might be otherwise."

She stopped short, arrested by the triumph of Douglas's face, which in its rally, showed all over pale face, stammered, fell into hopeless confusion, and bending low her proud head began to pull a bright coloring leaf from a vine. Douglas caught the little destroying hands and held them fast in his own.

"How is it with me, Margaret?" he asked, softly.

"Let me hear my sentence too. Would life with me be death to you?"

Margaret was silent, but she offered no resistance when he drew her close to his heart.

"Margaret, do you love me?"

"Oh, hush!—you know."

"No, I am not content as Thomas. I can't take in so much happiness. Set it to music. Say Douglas I love you."

"I—"

"Well—"

"Oh, I can't; you know that I do."

Douglas took off his ring—a shield of ivory, bearing the word Morpah in Hebrew lettering, each grand character cut in a different diamond.

"You will wear this, and remember its meaning," he said. He kissed it, put it on her arm and then, when we are absent one from another. My darling, you will think of me often."

"What else shall I have to do?"

"I hope nothing more distasteful; yet I wish I was not so inexorably flattered away to Saratoga. I feel like leaving you to the tender mercies of Mrs. Dayta."

"Hush!" whispered Margaret; voices and steps were in perilous neighborhood, people coming to look for Douglas Erfot. Douglas found time for only one word more, as they were standing in the door-way.

"You will write me often?"

"Of course."

The words were spoken half in a whisper, Douglas held her hand but an instant, but Mrs. Dayta caught both words and look, and the shadow that had haunted her face for the last few weeks deepened and darkened as she went back into the bright deserted rooms. Margaret had not yet gone up stairs but seated herself on the first sofa that fell in her way, unconscious of any thing but her own thought, not smiling, but reflecting in face and attitude inward glory. This radiance completed Mrs. Dayta's wretchedness. The sullen woman, who smouldered so long flamed up in fierce invective. Margaret had not said the purpose and the ambition of years as a very little thing, but stolen from her the only love she had ever valued. She had studied till studying was at an end. She had ragged all the more furiously, because of her long self-control. Margaret listened, at first bewildered and half-terrified, then indignant, and answered at last coolly contemptuous. Between these two traces could not exist again. No refuge was left Margaret now but her father's house, and the welcome, if the clammy fingers and the cool, unfriendly scrutiny of her stepmother could be called by so warm a name. Up the hill Difficulty lay Margaret's road from this time; her father had never loved her overmuch, had ceased to think of her at all; her step-mother said openly.

That Mrs. Dayta should provide for her family to stay with them, she would have more spirit than to come back to the bread cut of their mouths when her fine friends shoved her off."

Unjust as well as cruel, since Margaret worked, and lashed out words and stroke, but with chilled fingers and sewing, night and day.

Douglas Erfot remained with her. She must hear from Douglas soon. She had written to him a week ago, but the days went on into weeks, and she had Margaret to herself with a sullen triumph. "It is a month." Two months, and hope began to fade away, and still Douglas was silent; utterly alone in life. People don't thrive on convictions of that sort; and Margaret drooped so fast that at last even her father saw, and pulling the work from her hands made roughly told her to let it alone, and stay out in the air till she could look a little less like a ghost. She obeyed, but always in the same listless, hopeless way, in which no one could give her news of their solemn peace and assurance, and when she sought it from above, she only groped for it in the dark, and cried, "A God for all, and was not answered.

She stood one evening as she had stood a year before, watching the day go out. Heavy clouds rushed to bar out the sinking sun, and the dying light had time to set it in blood-red revolt, ended the dark man, buried down on it such flakes of flame as might have been the last throes of a world over it in long avenged glories, filled all the west with awful living splendor. The hills below her were already purple in the shadow, the mountain gloom above, its still fields dark to the very top, but lighting the snow on its crest into the very heart of the intolerable glory; and the valley between buried darkly in the clear light, and about the feet of the hills, trees and cedars curved into perfect vines, and showing, through trembling boughs of larch, yellows and crimson blended in a wild mosaic.

"Fears like us of de Lord was jes dar," said old Julia, once Margaret's nurse, drawing near, "when some such burnin' as de Holy ob Holies. I clar I'se most feared to look, I feels him so close."

"Not to the Julies. It only means wrathful and burning. I can't find the Lord."

"Kase you been too far, honey chile. Tell ye'le's close by; he's got hole on your hand jes now, poor lamb! He's been callin' you dis long time; he's been waitin' for you to come!"

"He has taken away every thing from me," Margaret answered, recklessly. "He has left me nothing. I am desolate—bereaved."

"De don't say dat, Miss Margret. De Lord's been very near to you. Talk how he led Moses day to de back ob de desert, and what he showed Paulk in de wonderful Revelations. He's in de grape, and how our blessed Jesus preached in de wild places 'cause de prince ob de world stopped at de eyes and walls ob de cities, jis as he come still you; and of you feels cast down, tink ob dat poor Lord Jesus when he was a little baby younger'n you. Spec his heart went down like lead sometimes when he was in dat yer prison, clean down, jis as you are all de time, and yet he come out de end—monster dat, Miss Margret."

"I can't endure it, Julia!" sobbed out Margaret, but a driving me mad already. I am going to Saratoga."

"I am alone, deserted altogether."

"No, you ain't, you precious chile. Tell you Christ jes here; not far off, way up 'mong de stars, as you tink. Try and believe, poor chile; only put out your hand and say, Lord help, I will come. Needn't be afraid to step, Miss Margret, he'll ketch you in his arms. He'll be so glad to see you, he'll drown; only try and see!" exclaimed Julist, tears streaming fast down her face.

A blank in Margaret's life. Of that abiding of Christ with flesh and blood those only can know who have laid their promises fully to heart. Words are not sufficient for the things of the spirit. Enough that Margaret found that peace that passeth all understanding.

The times grew stormier. War made itself heard and felt in every quarter, and of scenes belonging to either side grew to be no infrequent visitors. Margaret viewed them with utter indifference. What were they to her and sightings to her? But one night she caught the tones of a voice that made her heart leap up with a sickening throb, and burning short she met the incredulous look of a pair of blue eyes that certainly in the old time belonged to Douglas Erfot.

"Margaret!"

"Douglas!"

And then hesitation and reproach on either side.

"How cruel you have been to hide yourself here without a word!"

"You have forgotten me."

"Forgotten! I have looked for you every where. Why didn't you write?"

"I did."

"I have never received a line. I have been trying to find you for the last six months. I had commenced to despair."

And then Margaret told him all the story of the sorrowful year, ending with a glance at the ring.

"So you see, Douglas, the Lord did watch between us." And so she found rest, for be sure he did not leave her long in that dreary house, but took her into his life and to his heart forever.

THE "VANDERBILT."

We publish on page 748 a picture of the United States steamship VANDERBILT, in search of the pirate-ship in chase of the pirate Alabama. This magnificent vessel, the largest and most powerful ever yet built, at a cost of nearly one million of dollars, for Commodore Vanderbilt by Mr. Jeremiah Simonson some five years ago, and was last year presented to the Government as a free gift by her owner. She is 270 feet long, 50 feet beam, 53 feet depth of hold, and 3,360 tons. She is propelled by two engines of 1,800 horse power, and is notoriously the fastest vessel afloat, as well as one of the strongest. To prepare her for fighting, all her upper works on the main-deck have been cut away, leaving her deck flush from bow to stern. She carries twelve nine-inch Dahlgren guns, six on a side, and two 100-pound Parrotts, one forward and one aft, the other. Her power as a ram has often been described. It is said for this that she will be the best she could run down any vessel in the world. She is commanded by Commander Baldwin. We hope he may meet the Alabama.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL STANLEY.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL DAVID S. STANLEY, whose portrait we give on page 749, is a native of Ohio. He graduated at the Military Academy in 1841, and graduated ninth in a class of forty-one of 1852. His first service, after the usual routine of duty at the cavalry school of practice at Carlisle, was with the Surveying Expedition to the Pacific under Lieutenant Williamson. On the return of the expedition he was assigned to duty with the dragoons, on the Western frontier, where, in several conflicts with the Indians, he displayed much skill and energy and courage. Lieutenant-General Scott, in his annual report of events connected with the campaigns of 1858, says: "The gallant and gifted officer First Lieutenant David S. Stanley, First Cavalry from Fort Arbuckle, with Company D of his regiment, pursued into the Wichita Mountains a party of Comanches thirty minutes after receiving his orders. After an exciting chase of several hours' miles over rocks, the detachment killed and left dead on the ground eighteen Indians."

On the breaking out of the rebellion General Stanley was a captain of the First (now the Fourth) Cavalry, and with his company was distinguished in several engagements with the rebels in Missouri. In the affair at Wilson's Creek his horse killed under him. He acted a most conspicuous part at New Madrid and Island No. 10, and took, next, part in the battle of Corinth, in command of a division, where he gallantly led the brilliant charge of the Fifth Missouri and Thirty-Seventh Ohio, which was the crowning act in that glorious victory.

CHIEF QUARTER-MASTER INGALLS.

On page 749 we give a portrait of COLONEL RUFUS INGALLS, Chief Quarter-Master of Army of the Potomac, and one of our best soldiers. The following sketch will explain who he is and what he has done:

Rufus Ingalls, United States Army, Chief Quarter-master of the Army of the Potomac, entered West Point as a cadet from Maine, on the 1st July, 1839. He was born in Denmark, Maine, August 23, 1810; was first sent to duty on the Northern frontier, and served in Florida during the Seminole War. He was then in Kentucky, and served during the first Mexican War. Captain Ingalls was a Brigadier-General of Volunteers in 1847.

In the year 1852 he was promoted to a Lieutenancy in the Regular Army, and was ordered to California, where he served in May of that year. At the breaking out of the Civil War he was Adjutant of Fort Hamilton, and was one of the three under General Kearney, who assisted in the organization of Volunteers in New York. Subsequently he received a brevet into New Mexico as a General Staff officer, and was employed in various parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia in 1861, when he was ordered and appointed Chief Quarter-Master of the Army of the Potomac, during the insurrection in the early part of 1862. He was promoted to the rank of Colonel in the Regular Army, 1862, he was by his side, and assumed command of the Army of the Potomac, "to the satisfaction of the country and good conduct" on that occasion.

Colonel Ingalls has been, since, actively in the Quarter-masters' Department, and in April following called for Fredericksburg, on the 11th of May, 1863, his services were sent in that connection.

The Chief Quarter-Master of service on the Pacific he returned to the Atlantic States. Before the attack on Fort Sumter he was with the command of General Brown, as Chief Quarter-master, to reinforce Fort Pickens, when he served with the Army of the Potomac, and was present at the attack Yorktown, and the White House, on the Pamunkey, around to Harrison's Landing, on the James River, with numerous other engagements in the vicinity.

On the 13th of January, 1863, he was made a Major in the Quarter-master's Department, and has been since, for fourteen years' faithful service in that department, and in the command of the Army of the Potomac, Ingalls was announced as Chief Quarter-master of the Army of the Potomac

BRIGADIER-GENERAL THOMAS, OF THE ARMY OF THE OHIO.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

ADMIRAL DAVID D. PORTER.

ACTING REAR-ADMIRAL DAVID D. PORTER, the Commander of the Mississippi Flotilla, is the son of the famous Commodore David Porter of the Essex, and was born about the year 1814. In 1829 he entered the navy as midshipman on board the Constellation, and served six years on that ship and the United States. In 1835 he passed his examination, and served six years as passed midshipman on the Coast Survey. In 1841 he was commissioned a lieutenant, and served with that rank on board the Congress for four years. After a brief period of service at the Observatory at Washington, he was placed on active duty under Commodore Tattnall in the Gulf of Mexico, and took a leading part in the naval operations of the Mexican war. In 1849 he was allowed to take command of one of the Pacific Mail Company's steamers, and remained several years in the service of that Company. While he commanded one of the California steamships—the Oriental City—he performed an exploit which attracted no little attention at the time. In consequence of the Black Warrior affair the Spanish Government had refused to permit any United States vessel to enter the port of Havana. Running under the shotted guns of Moro Castle, he was ordered to halt. He promptly replied that he carried the United States flag and the United States mails, and, by the Eternal, he would go in; and he did, the Havanese fuming to fire upon him. He said afterward that he intended firing his six-pounder at them once, in defiance, after which he would haul down his flag.

At the beginning of the year 1861 he was under orders to join the Coast Survey on the Pacific, but, fortunately, had not left when the rebellion broke out. His name at this time stood number six on the list of lieutenants. The resignation of several naval traitors left room for his advancement, and the "Naval Register" for August 31, 1861, places him number seventy-seven on the list of commanders. He was placed in command of the steam sloop of war Powhatan, a vessel of about twenty-five hundred tons, and armed with eleven guns. After doing blockading duty for some time, he left that ship to take special charge of the mortar expedition. The active part he took in the reduction of the forts below New Orleans will make his name ever memorable in connection with the mortar fleet, or "bummers," as the sailors term them. After the capture of New Orleans he, with his fleet, went up the Mississippi River, and was engaged in several affairs on that river, including that of Vicksburg. From that place he was ordered to the James River, and returned in the Octorara. When off Charleston, on his way to Fortress Monroe, he fell in with and captured the Anglo-rebel steamer Tubal Cain. He has now been appointed to the supreme control of all the naval forces on the Mississippi River, with the rank of Acting Rear-Admiral. The forces under his orders, in vessels, guns, and men, will be larger than ever before under the command of any United States naval officer. His squadron will be distinct in every way from that of Admiral Farragut, who will still command the Western Gulf Blockading Squadron.

Admiral Porter is a man of wiry, muscular frame, handsome features, of medium height, and, a few years ago, universally admitted to be the strongest man in the navy. He is about forty-five years old, and exhibits but few marks of age. He is married to a sister of Captain C. P. Patterson, formerly of San Francisco, by whom he has several children. He is most truly "a worthy son of a worthy sire."

He belongs to a family of naval patriots: for, besides the subject of this sketch, there are in the navy H. B. Porter, acting midshipman, appointed from New York, November 29, 1859; T. K. Porter, master, appointed from Tennessee, May 20, 1862; William C. D. S. Porter, lieutenant, appointed from the District of Columbia, March 3d, 1847; and Wm. D. Porter, commodore, appointed from Massachusetts, January 1, 1823. The last-named commanded the Essex gun-boat on the Tennessee River, and fought the rebel ram Arkansas on the Mississippi River. Major-General Fitz John Porter is a cousin of the subject of our sketch, adding another hero to the family.

GENERAL THOMAS.

WE present above the portrait of Gen. GEORGE H. THOMAS, of Buell's army, who must not be confounded with General Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant-General of the Army.

General George H. Thomas was born in Virginia about the year 1812. He was appointed from that State to West Point in 1836, and graduated in the Third Artillery on 1st July, 1840. In the following year he was assigned himself to be sent against the Florida Indians, and was brevetted First Lieutenant for his gallantry. He accompanied General Taylor to Mexico, and at Monterey won the brevet rank of Captain. At Buena Vista, again, he distinguished himself nobly, and was brevetted Major. On the close of the war he returned home, and in 1850 assumed the responsible post of Instructor of Artillery and Cavalry at West Point. At the outbreak of the war Major Thomas was one of the few Virginians who honor enough to be true to him to rebel against his country's flag, and in May, 1861, he was appointed Colonel of the 3d Cavalry. In August of the same year he received the appointment of Brigadier-General of Volunteers. He has since served throughout the campaign in the West.

I.

FROM MRS. NOEL VANSTONE TO MR. LOSCOMBE.

"Park Terrace, St. Swithin's Wood, November 5.

"DEAR SIR,—I came to Hampstein yesterday for the purpose of seeing a relative, leaving Mr. Vanstone at Relol Cottage, and proposing to return to him in the course of a week. I reached London late last night, and drove to these lodgings, having written to secure accommodation beforehand.

"This morning's post has brought me a letter from my poor child, whom I left at Relol Cottage, with instructions to write to me if any thing extraordinary took place in my absence. You will find a letter inclosed in this. I have had some experience of her, and I believe she is to be strictly depended on for the truth.

"I purposely abstain from troubling you by any useless allusions to myself. When you have read my child's letter, you will understand the shock which the news contained in it has caused me. I can only repeat that I place implicit belief in her statement. I am firmly persuaded that my husband's brother contemplates foul play with out, has practiced on his weakness in my absence, and has persuaded him to make a new and false Will. From what I know of this woman I feel no doubt that she has used her influence over Mr. Vanstone to deprive me, by means of a false instrument in my husband's fortune.

"Under such circumstances as these, it is on the h i deepest conscientious—for other reasons than I need mention here—that I should see Mr. Vanstone, and come to an explanation with him at the earliest possible opportunity. You will find that my maid thoughtfully kept her letter-bag open on the last morning of my residence—without, however, having any later news to give me than Mrs. Lecount's visit to the cook at the cottage last night, and that she and Mr. Vanstone were to leave together this morning. But for that last piece of intelligence I should have been on my way back to Scotland before now. As it is, I can not decide for myself what it is right to do next. My going back to Dumfries, after Mr. Vanstone has left it, seems like taking a liberty for nothing—and a journey to London appears to be almost equally useless.

"Will you kindly advise me in this difficulty? I will come to you at Lincoln's Inn at any time this afternoon or to-morrow, which you may appoint. My next few hours are engaged, but as soon as this letter is dispatched I am going to Kensington, with the object of ascertaining whether my mother-in-law's dead address means any thing. I should be glad to know the meaning by which Mrs. Lecount may have accomplished her discovery on a spot founded on a lie. You will let me have your answer by return of post I will not fail to get back to St. John's Wood in time for the train.

"Believe me, dear Sir, yours sincerely,

"MAGDALEN VANSTONE."

II.

FROM MR. LOSCOMBE TO MRS. NOEL VANSTONE.

"Lincoln's Inn, Nov. 6.

"DEAR MADAM,—Your letter and inclosure have caused me great concern and surprise. Pressure of business allows me no hope of being able to meet you to-day or to-morrow morning. But if three o'clock to-morrow afternoon will suit you, at that hour you will find me at your service.

"I can not pretend to offer a positive opinion until I know more of the matter. Your connected with this extraordinary business than I find communicated either in your letter or in your maid's. But with this reserve I venture to suggest that your remaining in London until tomorrow may possibly lead to results advantageous alike your consultation as my chambers. There is at least a chance that one of us may hear something further in this strange matter by the morning's post.

"I remain, dear Madam, faithfully yours,

"JOHN LOSCOMBE."

III.

FROM MRS. NOEL VANSTONE TO MISS GARTH.

"Park Terrace, November 5, Five o'Clock.

"I have just returned from Westmoreland House—after purposely leaving it in secret, and purposely avoiding you under your own roof. You shall hear why I came, and why I went away. It is due to my remembrance of old times not to treat you like a stranger, although I can never again treat you like a friend.

"I traveled yesterday from the North to London. My only object in taking this long journey was to see Norah once more. I had been suffering for many weeks past from a complaint for which only miserable women like me can feel. Perhaps the suffering weakened me, perhaps it created it. Both things, tenderness—God knows!—I can't explain it; I can only tell you that I began to think of Norah more and more as the days and nights, with I was almost heart-broken. I have no better reason than this to give for returning all at once to London, and resolving to London to see her. I don't wish to claim more for myself than I deserve. I don't wish to be set down as the reformed and repenting creature whom you might have approved. I had only one feeling in me that I know of—the longing to see my child round Norah's neck, and cry my heart out on Norah's bosom. Publish whatever I am now. Something might have come of it; nothing might have come of it—who knows?

"My mind is full of feeling Norah without your assistance. However you might disapprove of what I had done, I thought you would not be slow to help me to find my child. When I lay down last night in my strange bed I said to myself, 'I will write to Garth in the morning, I will take my mother's advice, and tell me.' You don't know what a comfort I felt in that thought. You don't know what a good woman you are. You found Norah's neck, and cry my heart out on Norah's bosom. Publish whatever I am now. Something might have come of it; nothing might have come of it—who knows?

Something might have come of it; nothing might have come of it—who knows?

"Well, I fell asleep happily that night—for the first time since my marriage. When the morning came I awoke equally full of hope and happy, only for one night. When the morning came a letter came with it, which told me that my husband was on earth (you have meddled sufficiently with my affairs to know what enemy I mean—because I felt positively certain at Aldborough that you and Mrs. Lecount had been in correspondence with each other. But I never suspected Norah. If I lay on my death-bed at this moment I could say it with a safe conscience that I suspected Norah.

"So I went the morning to Westmoreland House—not to you for my sister's address, and to acknowledge plainly that I suspected you of being in correspondence with Mrs. Lecount.

"When I inquired for you at the door they told me you had gone out, but that you were expected back in the course of the morning. I would see your sister, who was then in the school-room. I waited there. I gave no reason for the account be disturbed; my business was not with her but with you. I begged to be allowed to wait as a favor to myself and to my mother.

"They showed me into the double room on the ground-floor, divided by curtains—as it was when I first entered the house. There was a fire in the outer division of the room but none in the inner division, and the curtains which hid it from view were drawn. The servant was very civil and attentive to me. I have learned to be thankful for small mercies, and I thanked her for her kind manner as cheerfully as I could. I said to her, 'I shall see Miss Garth's sister to-day, and you will be glad to hear that I can beckon her in through the long window.' The servant said I could do so, if you were not there, and that you had gone out several times with your own key by the back garden-door. I said I would wait, and the servant left me to let you know of my visit. I mention these trifles to show you that there was no premeditated deceit in my mind when I entered the house.

"I waited a weary time, and you never came. I had no knowledge at that moment—I don't even think so, or whether the large fire burning made the room really as hot as I felt it to be—I only know that, after what you have suffered, the curtains into the inner room to try the cooler atmosphere.

"I walked to the long window which leads into the back-garden, to look out; and almost at the same moment I heard the servant open the door of the room I had just left—and your voice and the voice of some other woman, a stranger to me, talking. The stranger said, 'Here are the parlor-boarders, I dare say.' I gathered from the first words that you had brought with you the bad met in the passage—she on her way down stairs, and you on your way in from the backgarden. After more conversation than I can now inform me that this person was a friend of my sister's, who felt a strong interest in her, and who knew that you had just returned from a visit to Norah. So far I only hesitated to show myself because I shrank, in my painful position from facing a stranger. But when I heard my own name immediately afterward on your lips and on hers, then I drew back from the nearer to the curtain between us and purposely listened.

"A moment more and I can say I was glad you did so. What better can you expect from such a woman as I am?

"You were always famous for your memory. There is no necessity for my repeating the words you spoke to your friend, and the words your friend spoke to you hardly an hour since. When you read them lines you will know, as well as I know, what those words told me. I ask for no particulars; I will take all your reasons and all your excuses for granted. It is enough for me to know that you and Mr. Pendril have been searching for me again, and that Norah is in the conspiracy this time, to reclaim me in spite of myself. It is enough for me to know that my child is to be taken from me before I have time to catch me, and that Mrs. Lecount's revenge has accomplished its object by means of information extracted from Norah's lips.

"Shall I tell you what I suffered when I heard these things? I will tell you nothing—I will only say that I left you. Whatever I suffer, I deserve it—don't I?

"I waited in that inner room—knowing my own violent temper, and not trusting myself to see you, after what I had heard—I waited in that inner room until the servant let me out. I should tell you of my visit before I should have left the house. You will know that I left it without misfortune happened. The servant, no doubt, heard the voices up stairs, and supposed that we had met each other in the passage. I don't know how long or how short a time it was before you left the room to see your friend off, your friend went with you. I raised the long window softly and stepped into the back-garden. The way by which you returned to the house was the way by which I left it. No blame attaches to the servant. As usual, when I am concerned, nobody is to blame but me.

"Time enough has passed now to quiet my mind a little. You know how strong I am? You remember how I used to fight against all my miseries when I was a child? Now I am a woman, I fight against my miseries in the same way. Don't pity me, Miss Garth! Don't pity me!

"I have no harsh feeling against Norah. The hope I had of seeing her to-day, and of taking her to me; the consolation I had in writing to her is a consolation denied me for the future. I am not to see her again. I have no angry feeling toward my sister. She means well, poor soul—I have not the means with. It would distress her if she knew what has happened. Don't tell her. Conceal my visit and burn my letter.

"A last word for myself, and I have done.

"If I rightly understand my present situation, your spies are still watching me, and I am to make no move as they searched at York. Dismiss them—you are wasting your money to no purpose. If you suspected me to-morrow, what could you do? My position has altered. I am no longer the poor outcast girl, the vagabond people performed for you once hunted after. I have done what I told you I would do—I have made the poorest sacrifice of property to accomplish this time. Do you know who I am? I am a respectable married woman, accountable for my actions to nobody under Heaven but my husband. I have got a place in the world, and a name to keep in it. Even the house in which is the friend of all you respectable people, has recognized my existence, and has become my friend too. Mrs. Lecount and her confederacy gave me his license to be married, and the rector of Aldborough performed the service. If I should put you on watching me in the street, and if I chose to claim protection from them, the law would almost support my claim. You forget what wonders my wickedness has done for me. It has made Nobody's Child Somebody's Wife.

"If you can give those considerations their due weight; if you will exert your excellent common-sense, I have no fear of being obliged to appeal to my newly-found friend and protector—the law. You will feel by this time what you have meddled with at last to some purpose. I am estranged from Norah—I am separated from my husband—I am defeated in Mrs. Lecount, and in Norah's fortune into Norah's hand.

"Those are my last words. Remember them the next time you feel tempted to meddle with me again. MAGDALEN VANSTONE."

FROM MR. LOSCOMBE TO MRS. NOEL VANSTONE.

"Lincoln's Inn, Nov. 6.

"DEAR MADAM,—This morning's post has doubtless brought you the same shocking news which it has brought to me. You and I, who have by this time, that a terrible affliction has befallen you—the affliction of your husband's sudden death.

"I am on the point of starting for the North, to make all needful inquiries, and to perform whatever duties I may with propriety undertake, as solicitor to the deceased gentleman. Let me earnestly recommend you not to hasten to Relol Cottage until I have had time to write to you again. Your presence there can be of no use, but, through ignorance of all the circumstances, pretend to offer now. You may rely on my writing after my arrival in Scotland by the first post. I remain, dear Madam, faithfully yours,

"JOHN LOSCOMBE."

V.

FROM MR. PENDRIL TO MISS GARTH.

"Stable Street, Nov. 6.

"DEAR MISS GARTH,—I return you Mrs. Noel Vanstone's letter. I can understand your mortification at the tone in which it is written, and your distress at the manner in which this unhappy woman has interpreted the conversation that she overheard at your house. I can not sympathize with you in your feelings of resentment. My opinion has never altered since the Combe-Raven time. I believe Mrs. Noel Vanstone to be one of the most reckless, desperate, and perverted women living; and any circumstance that strikes you as being more than usually strange in her conduct may be safely attributed to the influence of these characteristics.

"There can not be a moment's doubt on the course you ought to follow in this matter. Even Mrs. Noel Vanstone herself acknowledges the propriety of sparing her your additional and unnecessary distress. By all means keep Mrs Vanstone in ignorance of the visit to Kensington, and of the letter which it has called forth. It would be not only unwise, but absolutely cruel, to enlighten her. She is not in a condition to apply, or even any hope to offer, we might feel some hesitation in keeping our secret. But there is no remedy and no danger. Mrs. Noel Vanstone is perfectly justified in the view she takes of her own position. Neither you nor I can assert the smallest right to control her.

"I have already taken the necessary measures for putting an end to our careless inquiries. In a few days I will write to Miss Vanstone, and will do my best to transplike her mind on the subject of her sister-in-law. If I can find a sufficient excuse to satisfy her, it will be better she should think we have discovered nothing than that she should know the truth.

"Believe me, most truly yours,

"WILLIAM PENDRIL."

VI.

FROM MR. LOSCOMBE TO MRS. NOEL VANSTONE.

"Lincoln's Inn, Nov. 16.

[TRAVELER.]

"DEAR MADAM,—I am concerned to hear that the continuance of your indisposition prevents you from coming here. In compliance with your request, I now proceed to communicate to you, in writing, the information which I preferred communicating by word of mouth. Be pleased to consider this letter as strictly confidential between yourself and me.

"I inclose, at your desire, a copy of the Will executed by your late husband on the 20th of this month. There can be no question of the genuineness of the original document. I protested, in a matter of form, against admitting it to proof. solicitor assuming a position of authority at Relol Cottage. But he took the position without scruples, before the circumstances of the sole Executor under the second Will. I am bound to say that I should have done the same myself in his place.

"The serious question follows—What can be done for the child by your intervention? The Will executed under my professional superintendence, on the 20th of September last, has been destroyed, and ordered and revoked by the second and later Will, executed on the 3d of November. Can we disputo this document?

"I doubt the possibility of disputing the new Will on the face of it. If no doubt irregularities are committed, it is dated, signed, and witnessed as the law directs; and the perfectly simple and unobjectionable provisions which it contains are in no respect, that I can see, technically open to attack.

"This being the case, can we dispute the Will on the ground that it has been executed when the Testator was in a state of mind unfit to dispose of property, or when the Testator was subjected to undue and improper influence?

"In the face of these objections, the evidence would put an obstacle in our way. We can not assert that previous illness had weakened the Testator's mind, for the illness that he died suddenly, as the doctors had all along declared he would be, of disease of the heart. He was out walking in his garden as usual on the day of his death; he ate a hearty dinner; none of the persons in his service noticed any change in him; he was a little more irritable with them than usual, but that was all. It is impossible to attack the state of his faculties. There is no case to go into court with so far.

"Can we say that he acted under undue influence, or, in plainer terms, under the influence of Mrs. Lecount?

"There are many difficulties, again, in the way of taking this course. We can not assert, with any probability of success, that a woman in a place in the Will which she has no fair claim to occupy. She has cunningly limited her own interest, not only to a fair but to a low sum, but to what the late Mr. Michael Vanstone himself had the discretion of leaving her. If I were examined on the subject I should be compelled to acknowledge that I had heard him express his intention of leaving to Mrs. Lecount a sum to say that I have heard him express it more than once. There is no point of attack in Mrs. Lecount's behavior, if there is no point of attack in your late husband's choice of an executor. Mrs. Lecount has acted, under the most natural choice, of the oldest and trustiest friend he had in the world.

"Those considerations remains, the most important which I have yet approached, and which I have taken consideration which I have reserved to the last. On the thirtieth of September the Testator executes a will, leaving the bulk of his property with a legacy of eighty thousand pounds. On the third of November following he expressly revokes the will and leaves another in its stead, in which his widow is never once mentioned, and in which the whole residue of the property, after payment of some comparatively trifling legacy, is left to a friend.

"I cross entirely with you that the fact very valid reason can or can not be produced to explain such an extraordinary proceeding as this. If no reason can be assigned—and I know of none myself—I think we have a point here which deserves our careful consideration, for it may be a point which is open to attack. Pray understand that I am now appealing to you simply as a lawyer, and that I am obliged to look all possible eventualities in the face. I have no wish to intrude on your private affairs; I have no wish to write a word which could be construed into any indirect reflection on yourself.

"If you tell me that, so far as you know, your husband capriciously struck you out of his will without assigning reason or motive for doing so, and without other obvious explanation of his conduct, than that he acted in this matter entirely under the influence of Mrs. Lecount, I will immediately take Counsel's opinion touching the property of disputing the Will on this ground. If, on the other hand, you tell me that there are reasons (known to yourself though unknown to me) for not taking the course I propose, I will accept that intimation without troubling you, unless you wish it, to explain yourself further. In this latter event I shall write to you again, for I shall then have something more to say which may greatly surprise you on the subject of the Will.

Faithfully yours,

"JOHN LOSCOMBE."

VII.

FROM MRS. NOEL VANSTONE TO MR. LOSCOMBE.

"DEAR SIR,—Accept my best thanks for the kindness and consideration with which you have treated me—and let illness of body and have plead my excuse, if I reply to your letter without composure, in the fewest possible words.

"I have my own reasons for not hesitating to answer your question in the negative. It is impossible for us to go to law, as you propose, on the subject of the Will.

"Believe me, dear Sir, yours gratefully,

"MAGDALEN VANSTONE."

VIII.

FROM MR. LOSCOMBE TO MRS. NOEL VANSTONE.

"LESCOMBE INN, November 17.

"DEAR MADAM,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter answering my proposal in the negative, and reasons of your own. Under these circumstances—on which I offer no comment—I beg to perform my promise of again communicating with you on the subject of your late husband's Will.

"Be so kind as to look at your copy of the document. You will find that the paper in which he devises the whole residue of your husband's estate to Admiral Bartram ends in these words: To be by him applied to such uses as he may think fit.

"Simple as they may seem to you these are very remarkable words. In the hands of a less practical lawyer would have used them in drawing your husband's Will. In the second place, they are utterly useless to serve any private straightforward purpose. The legacy is left unconditionally to the Admiral; and he is under no bonds to be told that he may do what he likes with it. The phrase quoted above is one of two conclusions. It has either dropped from the testator's pen in pure ignorance—or it has been carefully set where it appears to serve the purpose of a snare. I am firmly persuaded that the latter explanation is the right one. The words are expressly intended to mislead some person—yourself in all probability—and the cunning which has put a trap to that end in the second place, by constantly happens when uninstructed persons meddle with law) has overreached itself. My thirty years' experience readily suggests to me in a sense exactly opposite to the sense which they are intended to convey. I say that Admiral Bartram is not free to apply his property to purposes as he may think fit—I believe he is privately controlled by a supplementary document in the shape of a Secret Trust.

"I can easily explain to you what I mean by a Secret Trust. It is usually contained in the form of a letter from a Testator to his Executors, privately informing them of testamentary intentions on his part, which he has not thought proper openly to acknowledge in his will. I have you a hundred guineas, and I have a private letter enjoining you, on taking the legacy, not to devote it to your own purposes, but to give it to some third person, whose name I keep my own reasons for not mentioning in my will. That is a Secret Trust.

"If I am right in my own persuasion that such a document I have describe is at this moment in Admiral Bartram's possession—a persuasion based, in the first instance, on the extraordinary words that I have quoted at the end, in the second instance, on purely legal considerations with which it is needless to encumber my letter—if I am right in this opinion, this discovery of the Secret Trust would be, in all probability, a most important discovery for your interests. I will not trouble you with technical reasons, or with references to my experience in these matters, the only a professional man could understand. I will merely say that I don't give up my opinion lightly but with the strongest conviction now impressed on my own mind is proved to be wrong.

"I will add no more while this important question still remains involved in doubt; neither can I suggest any means of solving that doubt, if the existence of the Trust was proved, but that the nature of the stipulations contained in it was made known to me. I could then say whether or what the legal chances were of your being able to set up a Case on the strength of it; and I could also tell you whether I should or should not feel justified in personally undertaking that Case, under a private arrangement with yourself.

"As things are, I can make no arrangement and offer no advice. I can only put you confidentially in possession of my private opinion, leaving you entirely free to draw your own inferences from it, and regretting that I can not write more confidently and more definitely than I have written here. All that I could conscientiously say on this very difficult and very delicate subject I have said.

"Believe me, dear Madam, faithfully yours,

"JOHN LOSCOMBE."

IX.

FROM MRS. NOEL VANSTONE TO MR. LOSCOMBE.

"DEAR SIR,—I have read your letter more than once, with the deepest interest and attention—and the offence I read it the more firmly I believe that there is really such a Letter as you mention in Admiral Bartram's hands.

"It is my interest that the discovery should be made—and I at once acknowledge to you that I am determined to find the means of secretly and certainly making it. My resolution rests on other motives than those which you would naturally suppose would influence me. I will tell you this in case you feel inclined to remonstrate with me on the course I take. I say when I assure you that remonstrance will be useless.

"I ask for no assistance in this matter; I will trouble nobody for advice. You shall not be involved in any rash proceedings on my part. Whatever danger there may be I will risk it. Whatever delays may happen I will bear them patiently. I am lonely and friendless and ill, but I am strong enough to win my way through worse troubles than these. My spirits will rise again, and my time will come. If that Secret Trust is in Admiral Bartram's possession, when the time comes I will find it out and with it in my own hands. Yours gratefully,

"MAGDALEN VANSTONE."

Handbills, Circulars, Billheads, Labels, Cards, &c,
And at a Saving of 75 per cent.

THE COTTAGE PRINTING PRESS,
PATENTED March 19, 1861.
The Cottage Printing Press
Is remarkable for its durability, simplicity, and cheapness, and in connection with the small Printing Office established, should be in the possession of every business man. They are adapted to the printing of Handbills, Circulars, Labels, Billheads, Envelopes, Invoices,

Small Newspapers, &c.

They will be found especially adapted to the use of Druggists, who usually require a great many labels, and but few of a kind, and to Merchants who wish to advertise their goods cheaply yet extensively. From the case with which they can be set up and worked, they are peculiarly well be found exceedingly useful in the Army. Secretary Simon Forrigan and Goldsborough have them in constant use, and speak of them in the highest terms. Printed Instructions are furnished with each office for beginners to compose, setting the type, &c. That no difficulty will be experienced by any one in working it satisfactorily, is fully demonstrated by the specimens of work sent to us by those who, prior to the purchase of a press, had never seen a type set or a sheet printed.

TESTIMONIALS.

Head-quarters 99th Regt. N. Y. V., U. S. Barracks, Washington, D. C., October 31st, 1862.
MESSRS. ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, N. Y. City.
GENTLEMEN,—I am free to say that your Press is a combination and thanks for the admirable manner in which the Press Printing Office was fitted up. Several of the Regiment have but done the work of the entire Brigade, Orders, Circulars, Blanks, Envelopes, Receipts, &c., as well as the big of the entire city, public and private. In addition to the above, we have had the pleasure of printing the "New Era," a paper of which ten months has obtained a circulation of eight hundred copies. Your Press is admirably adapted for the field, and obtain a Washington Press, but still your little press and material are in constant use. I have paid for them in full, and do not hesitate to recommend it for regular; so simple that a boy can be the press-work. I have used over 100,000 envelopes, and furthermore in the service to procure one immediately; and, once in his possession, he will be sure to part with his Quarter-of-a-Century as its invaluable aid: in fact, it should form part of his knapsack.

I inclose you specimen copies of the "New Era," which was done on stock in the camps of liberty and the restoration of the Union as a great victory. Again reiterating that your Press is a success, and that I am happy to say I have rendered you my thanks, I have the honor to be very truly your invaluable inventor, I remain, Yours, &c.,
Lieut. and Adjt. 99th N. Y. V. RICHARD B. IRWIN.
Quartermaster 99th N. Y. V. M. GEO. W. BRADLEY.

ADAMS PRESS CO.,
GENTLEMEN,—We have used one of your Portable Printing Presses for the last two years, and have in no way better satisfied with it than we expected to be. We use it principally for printing druggists' labels, circulars, &c., and we learned very easily and readily the art of setting type, printing, &c. We can get up a job of any description of labels, in as large or small quantities as we desire, with very little trouble, and in a very short time. We could almost as commend to the business as the most valuable machine in the printing business. Wishing you success with your press, we remain, Yours, &c.,

DEAR SIR,—I have had the "Cottage Printing Press" No. 3, which I bought of you about two years ago, in frequent use, and am entirely satisfied with it. I had no difficulty in setting type.
It is exceedingly useful for printing law papers, headings to note paper, business cards, etc. In fact, to lawyer or other business man should be without one. This press is every thing you have represented it to be.
Yours truly, WM. DEAN.

GENERAL BURNSIDE.

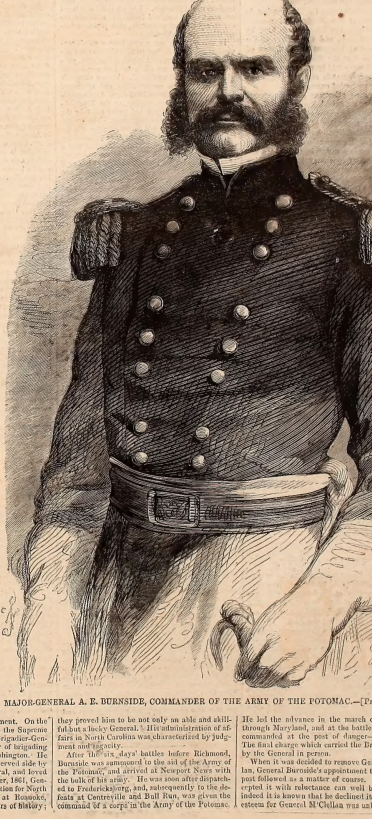
THE portrait of General Burnside, which accompanies these lines, will introduce the reader to the face and figure of one of the most gallant of our soldiers—the Commander of the Army of the Potomac. It is from a photograph by Brady.

Major-General Ambrose Everitt Burnside was born of Scotch parents, at Liberty, Union county, Indiana, on 23d May, 1824, and is consequently in his thirty-ninth year. He entered West Point in 1843, graduated in 1847, eighteenth in a class of 56, and was appointed to the artillery. He accompanied Bragg's Battery throughout the Mexican war, and with it entered the city of Mexico. At the close of the Mexican war Lieutenant Burnside was detailed for duty against the Apaches in New Mexico, and served some two years in frontier warfare. In 1852 he was appointed to the command of Fort Adams, Newport, Rhode Island, and while there he married Miss Bishop of Providence. In 1853 he resigned his rank in the army, and devoted his time and energy to the manufacture of the famous rifle which bears his name. When Buchanan was elected to the Presidency, his Secretary of War, Floyd, agreed with Burnside to arm a large portion of the army with his rifle, and induced him to establish extensive factories for its manufacture. The works were no sooner complete than another gun-maker offered Floyd pecuniary inducements to break his contract with Burnside, who was ruined in consequence. Assigning all his property to his creditors, Burnside came to this city without a dollar, sold his sword and uniform in Chatham Street, and went West in search of employment. He found it in the office of the Illinois Central, where, as soon as his energies and capacity became known, he received a salary of $2000 a year. Of this sum he paid one half regularly to his creditors, until by the help of a timely legacy he was enabled to liquidate his debts in full.

The outbreak of the rebellion found him at work in the office of the Illinois Central at New York. His opinions on the state and prospects of the country had been frankly expressed not only to his friends here, but to the leading citizens of New Orleans, which city he visited in February, 1861. He told the Southerners that they were going to plunge the country into a terrible war, in which they would be crushed; and, like Banks, he constantly strove to impress upon the minds of all Northern friends his belief that the war was no such child's play as Mr. Seward and others wished us to believe. When the call for troops was issued on 15th April, he tendered his services to the Governor of his adopted State—Rhode Island—and was appointed Colonel of the 1st Rhode Island Regiment. At the head of this and other regiments, with the rank of Brigadier-General, he fought, and fought well, at Bull Run. He went later tears that night at the result, which, in his opinion, might have been avoided by better management. On the appointment of General M'Clellan to the Supreme Command, Burnside was appointed Brigadier-General, and was charged with the duty of brigading the new levies as they arrived at Washington. He and M'Clellan were old friends, had served side by side in the office of the Illinois Central, and loved and trusted each other. In November, 1861, General Burnside set sail with his expedition for North Carolina. His brilliant triumphs at Roanoke, Newbern, and Fort Macon are matters of history; they proved him to be not only an able and skilful but a lucky General. His administration of affairs in North Carolina was characterized by judgment and capacity.

After the six days' battles before Richmond, Burnside was summoned to the aid of the Army of the Potomac, and arrived at Newport News with the bulk of his army. He was soon after dispatched to Fredericksburg, and, subsequently to the defeats at Centreville and Bull Run, was given the command of a corps in the Army of the Potomac. He led the advance in the march of that army through Maryland, and at the battle of Antietam commanded at the post of danger—the Bridge. The final charge which carried the Bridge was led by the General in person.

When it was decided to remove General M'Clellan, General Burnside's appointment to the vacant post followed as a matter of course. That he accepted it with reluctance can well be imagined; indeed it is known that he declined it twice. His esteem for General M'Clellan was unbounded. It will always be remembered to his honor that in the dark days of last winter, when every one was complaining of M'Clellan's inactivity, Burnside almost turned the tide by writing a letter in which he generously conceded the credit of his own victories to M'Clellan's plans.



General Burnside, as his portrait shows, is a very handsome man. Tall and stout, with a fine eye and a generous voice, he looks the very beau-ideal of a soldier.

It is pleasant to know that Burnside enjoys the utmost confidence and affection of the General whom he replaces. M'Clellan spoke hopefully of him when he heard of his appointment. "Burnside," he said, "is the best and honestest of men. He is no Mr. Pope. He will do a great deal better than you expect." On 8th they were all day closeted together. When he had given him his plans, M'Clellan signified his intention of leaving the field immediately to repost at Trenton, in compliance with the order. Burnside, reluctant to part with him so soon, urged him to remain a little longer—the interest of the country demanded that he should. "Well," said M'Clellan, to some officers around him, "I'll remain just as long as Burn wants me." "No you won't," replied Burnside, "for if you do you will remain with us altogether."

The Times correspondent says: "For an hour previous to M'Clellan's departure officers poured into the car in a stream to bid him farewell. Burnside and his aid on the seat together in earnest, confidential intercourse. At length all had gone, and Burnside rose to leave. It was an interesting moment. M'Clellan held out his hand, and Burnside seized it warmly in both his. M'Clellan then placed his hand on the shoulder of his brother General, and with a look full of unutterable things spoke a brief parting sentence to him, which is his legacy, and not the public's."

Another correspondent says: "Congratulated on his elevation by an acquaintance, Burnside thinly replied, 'That, Sir, is the best thing on which I wish to be congratulated.' When, on Friday, at midnight, the order assigning him to the command was brought from Washington in his deeply inswed, and going over immediately to General M'Clellan's headquarters, they sat up together in consultation during the whole night. This morning early I saw him walking up and down the balcony of the hotel which he makes his head-quarters in an abstracted, distraught condition, seemingly overwhelmed by the weight of responsibility resting upon him."

General Burnside is in command of the largest and finest army ever raised in America. We believe it to be an estimate of the numbers, but we may say that there are very few battle-fields in the world on which so large an army could be drawn up in line of battle. Perhaps Napoleon fought the battle of Solferino with fewer men. This great army has recently been subdivided into three grand divisions, namely: Right Grand Division, commanded by Gen. Edwin V. Sumner, consisting of the second and ninth corps, previously commanded by Generals Sumner and Burnside; Left Grand Division, commanded by General William B. Franklin, consisting of the first and sixth corps, previously commanded by Generals Hooker and Franklin; the Centre Grand Division, commanded by Major-General Joseph Hooker, consisting of the third and fifth corps, also commanded by Generals Heintzelman and Fitz John Porter. The eleventh corps, with such other troops as may be hereafter attached to it, is to constitute the reserve under General Sigel. This disposes of all the twelve corps of the Army of the Potomac. Dix, in Virginia, commands the seventh corps; Schenck commands the eighth corps in Maryland; Brannan, vice Mitchell, deceased, commands the tenth, in South Carolina; and the twelfth, we presume, will be left at Washington for the defense of the Capital. There is a rumor that Heintzelman with this corps may be detached on an independent service. But of this the public will know nothing until the work is done.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1862.

☞ THE SEVEN ILLUSTRATIONS OF MRS. WILKIE COLLINS'S new story now in course of publication in HARPER'S WEEKLY, are the most elaborate and beautiful ever made in connection with any American novel. The first movement toward Richmond, under M'Dowell, was by way of Bull Run. The second, under M'Clellan, was by way of the Peninsula. The third, under Burnside, will be by way of Aquia Creek and Fredericksburg.

The advantages of this road are so obvious that non-military observers have not been able to explain why it has never been used. It was tempted by our generals. In the first place, a railroad runs all the way from Aquia Creek to Richmond, a distance of sixty miles; and though the rebels may, and, of course, will, tear up the iron and burn the ties, they can not destroy the ground, hard road-bed which, and this is what is wanted for the transportation of artillery and stores. Next, there are very few creeks of any consequence between the Rappahannock and the James on the line of this route, and only two rivers, the North and South Anna, which will put even serious obstacles in an army as well provided as ours. The country traversed by the Aquia Creek Railway has not been desolated by the war, and provisions can be obtained by the army, especially forage for the cattle. At this season of the year Spotsylvania, Caroline, and Hanover counties, in which the campaigning will probably be done, are healthy, possessing in this respect a remarkable advantage over the country south of the James.

When we advance on Richmond from Aquia Creek, Fredericksburg will of course be the chief depôt of supplies for our army. This town is some fifty-five miles from Richmond, and it is clear at a glance that, as the army nears and reaches the rebel capital, our supply-trains will be exposed to cavalry raids. It is impossible even for our army as large as Burnside's to protect a line fifty miles long, and preserve at the same time an adequate operating force in front. Stuart will undoubtedly be able to ride around the army of the Potomac again. But if Burnside moves as swiftly as Napoleon would have moved, these raids will be of no more importance than the burning of whalers by the Alabama. While Stuart is burning supply-trains, Burnside will be taking Richmond. If he has an army encamped and motionless which fears cavalry raids.

The indications are, moreover, that the main attack on Richmond from the North will be assisted by demonstrations from another quarter. We notice that the Richmond papers and Harper's Weekly by some means or other, and we are therefore unwilling to reveal any thing which may not be a secret. But if Stuart has thrown the whole of his army to the north of Richmond to oppose Burnside, he may find his capital stolen by a sudden coup de main from another quarter. Our enormous army is beginning to tell at last. Perhaps the auxiliary force which will be stationed with the object of keeping up a counter-attraction in the interest of Burnside may not be numerically inferior to the army which M'Clellan commanded at Harrison's Landing.

In the mean time General Sigel remains at the Blue Ridge watching Jackson. That officer can not withdraw himself by dashing movements and daring strategem, all who know the history of that brilliant soldier will expect. But he will find his match in the cool, wary, and active officer whom the President has set against him. We have all, or nearly, the gaps in the Blue Ridge; one or two perhaps may have been purposely left unguarded in order to tempt Jackson through; but the probability is that he will detect the trap, and will either try to cross the Potomac into Maryland, or will fall back by way of Staunton. In neither case is Sigel likely to allow him to do more than give fresh proofs of unavailing valor and dash.

Time presses. More than half of November is gone. In a month we shall again begin to have our ears drained with the sickening old cry of mud, mud, mud! Let us hope and pray that our gallant Burnside will realize the vital urgency of the case, and will not lose a day or an hour in pushing forward in any and all manner. Delays are now as fatal as defeats. If we do not take Richmond before Christmas the Army of the Potomac will lose more men from disease in their winter-quarters than have perished in the bloodiest battle of the war.

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.

IRRESPECTIVE broils are always accompanied by foreign complications. Nations, like corporations, are soulless and selfish; they generally take advantage of their rivals' troubles to assail them. A couple of years ago no European nation cared to join issue with this country. Now that we are in trouble France, Spain, and England are all quarreling with us.

France claims from us the liberation of one Charles Heidsieck, a Champagne maker by trade, who, after the genius of M. Thurlow Weed, secured to act as bar-keeper on board the steamer which was permitted by General Butler to run to Mobile, and in that capacity came to grief by spy and mail carrier; for which crime he was very properly sent to Fort Pickens by General Butler. The French further claim indemnity from the United States for punishment inflicted by General Butler upon other Frenchmen resident at New Orleans, Frenchmen and offensive sympathizers with the rebellion.

Spain claims indemnity for the burning in Spanish waters of the rebel privateer Jefferson Davis. In fact, the Blanche was fired by her Anglo-rebel cruiser, and the officers of the Montgomery are in innocence of the Queen of Spain's flag. But the Spanish Government relies upon the story told by rebel sympathizers in Havana, and demands heavy damages for this and other pretended outrages.

England has no grievance at the moment. But a number of the British Parliament—Lord by name—is building war-vessels for the rebels at Birkenhead; a member of the British Government—Mr. Gladstone—has been publicly made by Mr. Laird, congratulate Jeff Davis on his having "made a navy" as well as "a nation;" the leading organ of the Government has spoken over the destruction of American shipping by the British steamer Alabama; and the Governors of the British colonies of the Bahamas and Bermuda, regardless of their obligations, feign enemies of our country may contrive we can only, as the boys say, grin and bear it. We are a young nation, and we have a long life before us.

If, therefore, France insists on reparation for the eminently just and proper arrest of the spy Heidsieck, and for the other equally legitimate acts inflicted on other French rebel sympathizers at New Orleans, we must grant it. If Spain will not listen to reason, but persists in paying for and pay for the steamer which Anglo-rebels burned in Spanish waters on the coast of Havana, we must pay, although the burning of every American boils at the scoundrelly conduct of the Englishmen who are building pirate ships to prey upon our commerce, and of the Anglo-Canadians in high station who encourage and abet the pirates in their infamy, yet still we have no choice but to bear it all patiently. We can only fight for pope and the rebels together. We must square accounts with the latter first. Then we may have leisure to deal with foreigners.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

On 10th Mr. Chase asked the public to subscribe for $13,000,000 of 7.30 notes. On 17th the bids were opened at Washington; the total amount of bids was about $23,000,000 was called for, and the rate of premium offered by the successful bidders was over 3 per cent. We believe this premium to be the highest ever made by a nation plunged into a desperate war with "varying fortunes and seemingly unfortunate results." When the Secretary of State Cobb, in the last year of his employment as Secretary of the Treasury, called for a loan of ten millions he could not get it. Mr. Chase himself, when he first assumed the management of the Department, could not negotiate a loan without strenuous exertions by patriotic bankers. Now, when he asks for money, the public offer him twice as much as he wants, and agree to take his Treasury Notes at a premium. This it appears that, notwithstanding all that has been said about mismanagement and the depreciation of the public credit, people have some faith yet both in the nation's solvency and the Treasury Department.

Our foreign friends will say, of course, that the loan was taken eagerly simply because it was asked for in the "depreciated currency," which the public wanted to get rid of. The best answer to this is the simple fact that in the three cities of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, the bankers who advanced $12,000,000 on account of this loan could not scrape together that amount of the "depreciated currency," and that they had to send to almost every Northern city to procure the requisite number of notes. The currency may be depreciated, perhaps; but it is certainly very scarce.

THE LOUNGER.

NATURAL PARTIES.

MEN are instinctively partisans upon the right or the wrong side of every question. We may act instinctively, because all great parties are but imposing manifestations of private convictions and bent of nature. Thus a man is by nature, so to speak, Catholic or Protestant. It is not education and habit alone that make him so; but he naturally leans upon external positive authority, upon precedents, and the result of experience; or he is naturally independent of others, self-reliant, has faith in enough salt in men to save them, believes in the future, and eagerly seeks to meet it. If he is of the first kind he is a Catholic in Romish countries, and conservatively orthodox in Protestant. He is of the latter, always and everywhere Protestant. His hands and feet, even his mouth, may conform under pressure to the rule; but his heart and brain are stout dissenters, and hospitably entertain every thought, every movement, that promises better things for the future.

In this way you can reason from a man's convictions upon one subject to his opinions upon another. So you can reason upon question and, politic or private, but we all know how our friends will range themselves at will. We are naturally Whigs and Tories, conservatives and reformers. There is always a chance in change. Consequently the theory of Conservatism, or the Establishment, always is, that you had better not take the chance for fear of worse things. But the ground of Reform is, that you had better take the risk for hope of the result. It is not fair to judge either Conservatism or Reform. Lord Macaulay was a Conservative, and John Wilson was a Reformer. If you look on Reform as you will choose to rank with Macaulay. But then there was a Tory, and Lord Somers was a Whig. Will you be Whig or Tory? Is his our wish? Then you will go to Somers's Creed is a "Conservative," and Joseph Hall or "Radical." Which compunction do you select?

It is just like this with the merits of a cause from its supporters, because men may espouse the best causes, as they do the worst, without seeing the best reasons. But it is still true that men have a natural sympathy with one or the other side of every question. If Te Tarquin were living to-day there would be no doubt what opinion he would hold of this rebellion. Certainly he was neither a typical Whig nor Tory. He had no such perception and too much imagination not to feel the reasons and the charm of the established order. But he had too much faith and wisdom not to desire its constant modification. He blended his excellences with their dispositions. He leaned to Reform. Macaulay, on the other hand, was a much more refined Tarquin than Don Tarquinius. But he had less conviction, less intrinsic faith in men and justice, and he consequently leaned to conservatism. If these two men could express themselves upon our struggle, undoubtedly Macaulay would stand with Gladstone and Du Chesnevelle and Lord Robert Mill.

This truth of natural affinity is constantly illustrated in our own experience. Here is always one party in the country which is a kind of King and Lazzaroni party. We all know that the greatest mass of the ignorant and base, of the vicious and of the cynical and indifferent, of the skeptical and designing, will be found in it. There will always be many splendid exceptions. But, meeting a man of either of these classes, you may be very sure that he is a man who belongs to that party. There is always another party composed mainly of nether extremes, but made up of the great mass of the intelligent, honest, industrious, who have much faith, much enthusiasm, much independence, and even their fanaticism is generous, in the long run, be the minority party of the country. There will be plenty of corrupt men acting with it for various reasons, but the principles of the party will be just, elevating, and humane. And whatever be the name or history of the parties which at any time divide the country may be, when they all dissolve upon any emergency they range with with others in something according to this law. The men, the designing, the ignorant, the base, the cynical, the timid, the skeptical, will always range new names for the same old purpose, while the force of the moral character of the country will be drawn against them.

Whatever, therefore, may be the personal character of individuals of any party, it must and will be judged historically by its tendency, by its conduct, by the average character of those who support it, by the principles which it avows, by the arguments to which it appeals. In all history there have been really but two parties—that of equity, rights and liberty, and that of might—the people or a true democracy, and that of classes and races or a true aristocracy. There were and are no others in other countries; there have been and are no others here.

RICHARD COBDEN.

IT is curious and interesting to observe how the law of which we have just spoken operates in the distribution of the sympathy of representative foreigners in our rebellion. The latest illustration is that of Richard Cobden. He is a man who compels respect not only by his character and powers, but by his personal bearing. He is not hood-winked by any assumptions or sophistries. He puts people in mental terror by his face. He clubbed Lord Palmerston to open Parliament with the most tremendous statistics; and by actual figures and extracts from French reports, showed in a trenchant pamphlet, which charged in upon Lord Palmerston's loose talk like a rustled knight upon a flock of sheep, that he had for his own purposes scared England by the fear of a French invasion which was totally groundless, and which was known in England, at least, whom Lord Palmerston can not bully nor Lord Russell cozen.

Mr. Cobden has lately made two speeches. The first was a consideration of the present state of American affairs and of the imperial secretary to Great Britain of some change. But the very force and truth of his argument, based upon the dependence of that Power upon others, will embolden those others to accede to any radical change. In that speech he incidentally mentions the appalling poverty into which Lancashire has already fallen, and in which the poor population must sink still lower by Christmas, unless the Northern will be at liberty to let cotton purposes to be cared for, so that, in his opinion, Parliament will have to make special provision.

"Of course, then, said defendant out her lover at a wicked fratricidal war waged for power against a brave people, struggling for themselves and for the rights of man against an intolerable tyranny —a war which Mr. Commissioner Mason expressly says will not suppress the spirit of liberty or tyranny—will compel us to interfere!" shouts John Bull, impatiently.

By no means, returns Mr. Cobden. It would cost England more to interfere for six months than to feed her starving workmen for two years. And besides that, it would not bring forward cotton. Moreover, if you ask me, he says, what I think of this war, I tell you frankly that I pretend to see into a millstone, as Lord Russell and Mr. Gladstone are always gravely doing. But see if I did, I should not see what they do. If the war should end soon, I don't believe it would result in separation. And why, pray, are you so eager for dictation in America while you there so lustily for union in Italy? If it is all right to make a Union in Italy against the established Government, why is it all wrong for an established Union to maintain itself in America?

Mr. Cobden fully understands the fact that with us Union is identical with nation. He has travelled in this country for years, and very open, and he knows the necessity of Union. He doubtless perceives that that necessity is overmastering and controlling consideration of the war. He knows, as most thoughtful men here acknowledge, that even slavery will go hence that Union; and that if there are many who hesitate about the President's Proclamation, it is because the honest fear that it may endanger the cause of Union generally. They think that the Union can be saved without it, and that the Union is more important than slavery; that slavery is not necessary to the Union, and when they see that, on the contrary, it is threatening its life and endangering the cause, Mr. Cobden cried when the full force of the Austrian and Papal power was in the scales against Italy. But, with precipers upon each side—"In the name of the Holy Trinity, cut all loose!"—and down came the swords and axes, and wicked priests and men to the enemy, utterly consuming them.

Mr. Cobden probably saw that, despite the educated hostility of the upper classes toward the rest of the country, the cardinal necessity of any great national movement here was Union. That is an insight gained by actual contact. The other English orators, Palmerston, Russell, Gladstone, and the rest, speculate abstractly. They can not see why it would not be just as well for us to cover the continent with a happy family of savers by the Mississippi, as boundless contiguity of San Marinese. Mr. Gladstone alone, apparently, believes that we are strangely and wickedly split, that the strongest instinct of the American people is for Union—stronger even than for Liberty.

AT NIBLO'S

THE curtain falls upon the mute and pathetic parting of Jeannette and Jeannot, the children with yellow hoops. The curtain hums quickly the plaintive melody of the finale and remember other days. The great audience rustles and murmurs, and the programme is consulted to know for which Niblo's is immemorially famous, is once more rolled together. Smoke is humming and scudding and rushing and scraping behind the drop. The huge curtain itself is bulged forward. There is a noise and sound of tension of preparation, and the complacent curiosity of the children becomes intense in the front of the orchestra-chairs.

At last the criminal delay of the orchestra is stooed for by the beginning of the music. The curtain rises on a brilliant scene of fairy splendor with wooden horses of various heights, which they begin to plant along the middle aisle of the parquet up to the stage. They do them carefully together, lay long their elastic floorings between them, and finally unroll enormous mattresses upon them covering them with dark woolen cloth; so that there is now a carpeted and mattressed platform from the stage to the orchestra, close to the rear of the stage. Then for the first time you observe a little fellow in the centre of the parquet of the second tier, upon which stands a stool; and to this a ladder is raised at the end of the long platform by a perfect attendant.

Every thing is ready. The music plays on. The murmur of the audience subsides. The bright little eyes are strained toward every point of the stage; and then suddenly from the side scene emerges the stout form of Gabriel Ravel—himself an institution of New York amusement—leading by the hand a very small, tiny child, the grandchild of the Ravels, John Haslen, called "Little America." The figure of the child is that of a young athlete, not Ganymede the cup-bearer, nor Oberon the fairy king; but strong, round, muscularly firm, compact, and energetic as a young Ajax. He makes his entrance with four of sixteen-pounder rest to each side of the house, then touches Gabriel's shoulder and alights upon the platform. Advancing to the point over the edge of the stage he bows again; then steps rapidly along to the ladder, mounts it, and stands upon the stout in front of the balcony of the second tier.

Do you observe, then, the trapezes hanging from the high dim roof of the theatre, the ropes with which the cross-pieces; and can you, through your glass, see the marvelous breadth of the child's hands? There is a little bar-trapeze which you can just grasp at the height, and see the mattresses, suggestive of falling, and the look at the other trapeze, the flying boy. But here is Gabriel trying each trapeze to be sure that it hangs firm and true, and now he stands facing the boy and swinging from the first one, which the boy catches, and, grasping stoutly with both hands, begins to swing. Gabriel does second ready. He nods; he draws it back; it swings far forward. Once, and the boy sees the range. Twice, and hoisting his body upward he launches himself upon mid air, as smoothly, noiselessly, and perfectly as a swan launches itself upon the water, he shoots from shore. He catches the second, the third, and so with effortless grace swings from out to and of the vast space, leaving upon your mind the impression of a long reach of exquisitely swaying waves. From that moment the little aerial genius is at home. He turns from one to another, he hangs by his feet, he folds his body over the bar of the trapeze, and sits as unconcernedly in the air and alights upon the swinging bar; he vaults backward and descends upon the platform, hanging over the edge of it, and climbs to his place again, and once more sweeps forward into space and reverses and darts rapidly amidst the study of swaying of the ropes. You fear for him no more than for white doves tumbling and soaring in the air. The whole scene is one of smooth, and noiseless. It has the effect of exquisite music. It is the utmost triumph of skill.

This wonderful little Ajax is a boy of fourteen by birth, but from his tenderest years has been trained by Gabriel for his art. He is a pupil of well-mannered boy, whom you can not think of as devoted to this career without sympathy and compassion, but whom you can not see in training without admiration. For a performance so perfect that it destroys all sense of peril, while it inspires new wonder for the capacity of the human frame.

BURNSIDE REBUKING PARTY-SPIRIT.

We all know that General Burnside is in politics. We all believe that our own men are the best men, and our own way the best way. But this is a tendency which in its dangerous form is unlike the circumstances in which we are now placed. You may prefer the golden path of peace to the rough summit of Mont Blanc and I another. But we can not stop long to quarrel about them. We must do our best to get to the best, between the two, and help and push on. If you know the guide does not know the way, or is not strong enough to stand the work, you may give up Mont Blanc and choose. But to give it up and dismiss the guide you have, because you think of another and better to take the other, is never to reach the top of the mountain and to stay a great fool in the valley.

Vehement party-spirit is always a thing disheartening and dangerous. Have the people of this country taken up arms to exalt Seward, or Fremont or Blair, or M'Clellan, or are they in Virginia and the West to save their government and the civil liberty of which it is the guarantee? Is it the feeling for any General superseded devotion to the cause and the country? Would any man break his sword because Fremont was one great and noble and conspicuous character and service, but upon party-spirit.

The dignity and spirit of General Burnside in dealing with an individual case of this kind is recorded in his lasting honor. Upon the retreat of M'Clellan a young Rhode Island officer—and it is the first blot upon the story of that noble State in this war—said that "After this we may as well give up and acknowledge the rebels." General Burnside sent for him and charged him with the remark. The officer confessed it, and urged that he said more than he meant. "You have now an opportunity to retract it," said Burnside; "but if I were not personally acquainted with your antecedents and loyalty you would be instantly dismissed." Neither you nor any other officer, high or low, can utter such sentiments and remain in this army." The officer made a most ample apology. The General showed that he perfectly understands his position.

WITHIN THE REBEL LINES.

THE war has occasioned no more interesting work than the one to which the following article alluded—"Thirteen Months in the Rebel Army." It is a short and simple story of a New Yorker who was imprisoned into the rebel army, and who served with his eyes and mind open. If it could be read by every man in the loyal part of the country it would inspire such resolution in the defense of the Government that the world would see what it has not yet seen—that this nation means to save its own life by the annihilation of the conspiracy against it.

There is one thing which the author mentions, and of which we have often spoken. It is an evil which becomes every day, and which all faithful citizens should do their best to withstand. This evil is the furnishing information to the enemy under the guise of giving news. The papers of yesterday and to-day, for instance, are filled with important intelligence for the enemy. If the Government can not remedy the difficulty, why does not the loyalty of individual editors prevent it?

Hear what the author, who has been thirteen months within the rebel lines, says:

"I may here state that the Confederate authorities have complete control of the press, so that nothing is ever allowed to appear in print which can give information to the North or dishearten their own men. In this it appears to me that they have an unpardonable advantage over the North, with its numberless papers and hundreds of correspondents in the army alone. Under such a system it is an absolute impossibility to conceal the movements of the army. With what the correspondents tell and scatties, and what the Confederates find out through spies and informers of various kinds, they are able to see through many of the plans of the Union forces before they are put in execution. No more common remark did I hear than this, so often were reading the Northern papers: 'do what foolt these Yankees are! General A——— has left Acquia for Gordonsville. We will cut him off. The Northern Generals or the Secretary of War tolerate the freedom of news for an object. Unfortunately for my duty I learned since coming North has contained information either by direct statement or implication which the enemy can profit by.... Sure am I that if a Southern paper would publish information of their movements as do the Northern papers, the editor's head would not be safe an hour.

The destitutency of this work to the desperate hatred of the rebellious section toward the country is most valuable:

"The force of public opinion in Selma was such that no man else to fight could remain there. The unmarried ladies were so patriotic that every able-bodied young man was constrained to enlist. Some months previous to this gentleman's arrival there he engaged for an early marriage, and hence declined to volunteer. When his betrothed, a charming girl and a devoted lover, heard of his refusal, she sent him, by the hand of a slave, a petticoat, inclosing a note. The package contained a lady's skirt and crinoline, and the note these terse words: 'Wear these or volunteer.' He volunteered."

Contemptible as this spirit, which is universal and not exceptional, the author vehemently exclaims:

"When will the North wake up to a true and manly patriotism in the defense of their national flag, now threatened by the base group of their traitorous rebellion?.... The North is asleep, and it will become the step of death —national death—if a new spirit be not speedily awaked."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SCENE AT THE SESSIONS.

BROOKER (to prisoner). "How do you live?"

PRISONER. "Only partridges, as the owner said when they asked whether he'd be roasted or fried."

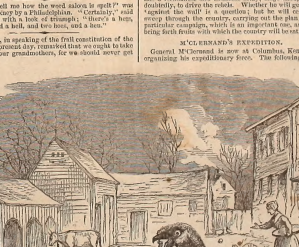
RECORDER. "We don't want to hear what the oyster said. What do you follow?"

PRISONER. "Principally that comes in my way, as the locomotive said when he ran over a man."

RECORDER. "That's nothing about the locomotive. What is your business?"

PRISONER. "Various, various, as the cat said when she stole the chicken."

RECORDER. "That comes nearer to the line, I suppose?"



PRISONER. "A little near in my line, as the rope said when cleaning the bell."

RECORDER. "If I hear any more of your nonsense I'll give you twelve months."

PRISONER. "I'm done, as the beef-steak said to the cook."

"Can you tell me how the wood saloon is spelt?" was asked of a Cockney by a fellow-traveller. "Certainly," said the Londoner, with a look of triumph; "there's a hen, and a hay, and a hell, and two hesses, and a hess."

A physician, in speaking of the frail constitution of the women of the present day, remarked that we ought to take great care of our grandmothers, for we should never get any more.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

THE following General Order has been issued respecting the observance of the Sabbath day in the army and navy:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, Nov. 14, 1862.

The President, commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy, desires and enjoins the orderly observance of the Sabbath day by officers and men in the military and naval service. The importance for man and beast of the prescribed day of rest; the sacred rights of Christian soldiers and sailors; a becoming deference to the best sentiments of a Christian people, and a due regard for the Divine will, demand that Sunday labor in the army and navy be reduced to the measure of strict necessity. The discipline and character of the national forces should not suffer, or the cause they defend be imperiled by the profanation of the day or the name of the Most High. At the time of the battle of Antietam, on the week of Washington's birth, "Men may find enough to do in the service of God and their country without violating the Sabbath by needless labor or secular business." The first General Order issued by the Father of his Country after the Declaration of Independence inculcates the religious duties of the camp or battle-field, and should ever be defended: "The General hopes and trusts that every officer and man will endeavor to live and act as becomes a Christian soldier, defending the dearest rights and privileges of his country."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

THE Army of the Potomac is moving from its encampments between Warrenton toward Fredericksburg, sixty miles from Richmond. The line of march—as taken up on Friday, 10th, Warrenton was occupied on 11th, and General Sumner's corps on the extreme right—is as follows:

The line of supplies will be to Aquia Creek, which is only a few miles from Fredericksburg, and connected with it by a railroad.

THE WAR IN THE SOUTHWEST.

Our advices from the southwest indicate the likelihood that a battle with the Texan Gen. between the national forces under General Grant and the rebels lately at Holly Springs, is imminent, and perhaps will be fought by the time this reaches the public. A dispatch, dated the 14th, states that five regiments of cavalry were advanced on the previous evening from Lamplin's Mills to within two miles of Holly Springs, and that the whole force of Washburn and Hatchie, during which the rebels had cut their bridges and destroyed the railroad for miles. The rebels, under General Pemberton, are said to be but little inferior in number to those from Holly Springs whither a battle may be regarded as inevitable. The rebels are in danger of being hemmed in, doubtless, to drive the rebels. Whether he will get them together, the result is a question; but he will probably sweep through the country, carrying out the plan of this particular campaign, which is an important one, and profiting forth fruits with which the country will be satisfied.

M'CLELLAN'S EXPEDITION.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN is now at Columbus, Kentucky, organizing his expeditionary force. The following Indiana regiments have either arrived at or are on the ——— Ohio to join General M'Clernand's "Custer Oil Expedition" to Memphis: Eighty-fifth, Eighty-eighth, Eighty-ninth, Ninety-seventh, Ninety-ninth, and One Hundredth. The Eighty-fourth, Colonel Mansfield, and the Ninety-third, Colonel Williams, will leave in a day or two for Columbus, and the old star forts part of the same expeditionary force.

THE UNION ARMY.

THE Union forces, consisting now of over seven hundred thousand men, are distributed as follows: Under the command of General Banks, in the valley of the Potomac, assisted by Hunterdown and Sigel, is the corps of General Fremont, which is to be augmented by the troops of the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad; General Peck and General Foster will look after the Southern Atlantic coast-line of Richmond. General Banks and General Hooker are to be the right wing of the army, and will be held by the rebels; General Rosecrans is moving through Central Tennessee; General Granger through Kentucky. General Grant into Mississippi; General Schofield defends Missouri, and General Curtis is in the valley of the Mississippi river; and General M'Connell will soon be on his way from the Mississippi River.

THE BATTLE OF LABADIEVILLE.

WE have full details of the expedition under command of General Weitzel, for the capture of Labadieville, which is considered important as a place of supplies. It was and defeated them after a brisk fight and a brilliant display of generalship on the part of General Weitzel. Two days of two hundred of the enemy were killed, wounded, and taken prisoners, and one piece of artillery was captured. The rebels were pursued in the direction of Derwick's Bay where Commander Morris was stationed to meet them.

THE TEXAN COAST IN OUR POSSESSION.

THE officers of the gun-boat Connecticut report that the entire coast of Texas is now in possession of the United States forces. The effect of the occupation is seen in the fact that the rebels are removing their cotton hastily to Port the Rebels' Cumberland trade, through Texas ports, is now effectually cut off.

THE NEW GOVERNOR OF TEXAS.

HON. A. J. HAMILTON has been appointed Military Governor of Texas.

AFFAIRS AT RICHMOND.

THE General in Chief has received correspondence says that General Lee is about to go into winter-quarters between the Rapidan and Rappahannock, and that his policy is represented as frightful. We are told that "certain persons" have been endeavoring to get Mr. Benjamin dismissed, and all manner of villainy are on the increase most terrible. Gen. Lee is said to be very much disheartened by the situation of affairs, and it is said here, in spite of the largest mills in the world, and the most extensive gun-foundry in the world, that Richmond is worse than starving now. Gen Beauregard is now at Charleston, and it is said that Gen Bullitzer was often Winter Harris was the Widow of the Rev. Dr. Fry, of New York, and has been for a long time a resident of Richmond. The Richmond streets after nightfall without cost. A large and well-organized gang of ruffians has taken the town." They lie in wait at almost all hours, and with the most cruel and fiendish ingenuity, and all the other devilish implements of mischief, for the purpose of highwaymen to obtain the victims; and they attack every body that walks alone, often in the most populous and crowded streets.

GOVERNOR VANCE A REBEL.

THE correspondence between Governor Vance (Rebel) and Governor Stanly (Union), of North Carolina, relative to a flag of truce proposed by Governor Vance, has thrown an unfavorable termination. According to latest accounts Governor Vance declines any meeting with the loyal Governor Stanly. He also declines a conference of Commissioners with Governor Stanly, and says that the rebellion will fight to the last drop of blood, and refers Governor Stanly to the Richmond papers for information. It is true directly with the Confederate authorities at Richmond. Governor Vance is a rebel, and has no power to treat with a regiment with North Carolina, as far as Governor Vance's influence in that State reaches.

BRAGG DISGUSTED.

GENERAL Bragg, in his official report to the Confederate Government, says that the people of Tennessee joined him in large numbers in that State; that the people hesitated to take Confederate scrip when they had the gold-bearing Union prices for supplies.

A SPEECH FROM M'CLELLAN.

"To a crowd who waited upon him at Trenton, on 13th, General M'Clellan said:

"Mr Friends—for I feel that you are all my friends—and third friends, you see, not as a matter of fact, but as a politician, but as a soldier. I came among you to ask you to stand by me in the coming struggle for the principles received nothing but kindness. Although I appear before you as a soldier, I am not a soldier. I appear unaccustomed with your history. Your gallant soldiers were with me on many battle-fields on the day of victory and the battle of Antietam, and here I bear witness to their gallantry and devotion to the cause. I thank you for the opportunity that the General has given me [a few moments]. I also have to speak of the ever faithful, ever true Trenton. I thank you for the many proofs you have given their lives for the maintenance of our government, and I thank you boldly my own right. I have this piece of advice to give you: While the army is fighting, you as citizens of the State are required for the preservation of the Union and the Constitution, for your nationality and your rights at stake."

ARREST OF MEMBERS OF M'CLELLAN'S STAFF.

THE members of General M'Clellan's Staff—Lieutenant-Colonels Key and Colburn, and Lieutenant Colonel Lagrone Corps.—on 13th, sent to Washington, from Trenton, New Jersey, by Gen. Dix, under arrest, for the purpose of stating their knowledge of the conduct of the late campaign, and consequently had no right to leave their places in the army in accompany General M'Clellan to Trenton.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

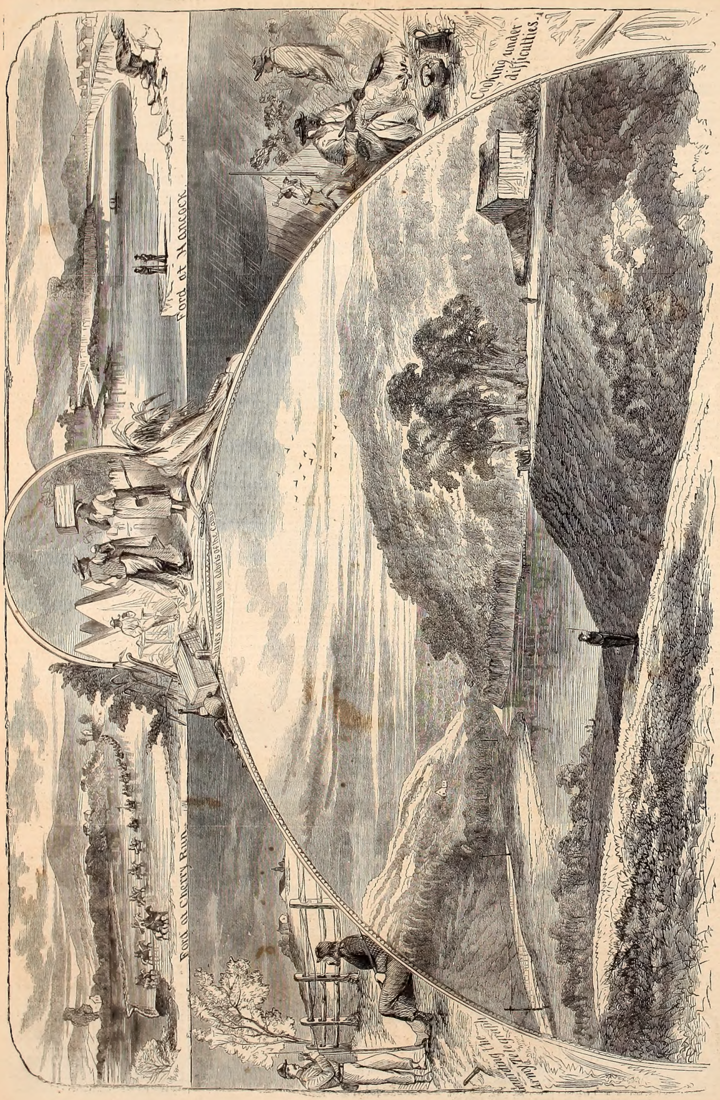
ENGLISHMEN IN THE PRIVATE RANKS.

THE London Times of November 6 denies that any blame can attach to the English Government relative to the fitting out of the rebel pirate-ship Alabama. It is England, the Times says, does not wish to be at war with us, but her shipyards are open to all," and she sells the "component parts" of vessels "to all customers."

A SPEECH FROM MR. COBDEN.

MR. Cobden, M.P., has addressed an important speech to his constituents at Rochdale. In it he strongly condemns the idea of English intervention in the American war. He said that such a movement on the part of the Cabinet would do injury instead of good, and would not help our cotton; a war with the North was certain to ensue, and this struggle would cost Great Britain more money in six months than the world had all the Southern Confederate operations for ten years.

CARNOTTUS FOR THE REBELS.

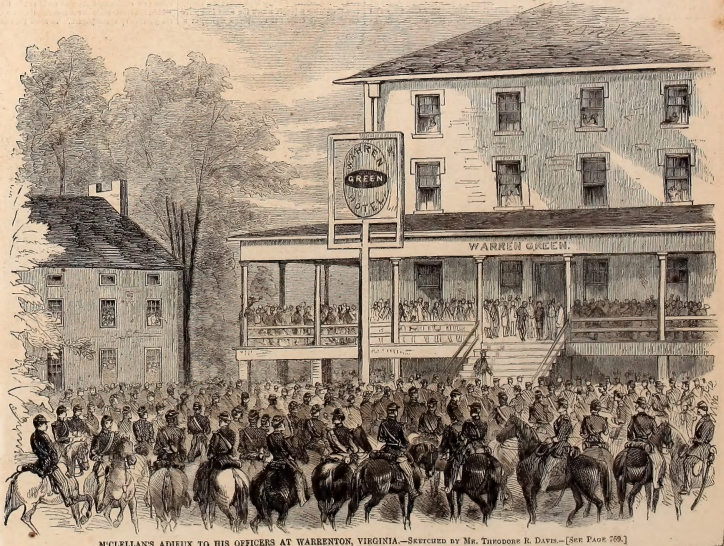


THE famous bathing club of Cambridge University (the Union debating society) has overrun with rebel sympathizers. The question was put thus: "That the Cause of the North in the War is Not a Righteous Progress." The proposition was negatived by a vote of one hundred and seventeen to thirty-three.—Lord Russell's silence on speaking with the majority against it.

ITALY.

GARIBALDI COMING HERE.

THE Independance Belge of the 10th October, writing concerning Garibaldi, says that he has full confidence in the successful results of his medical treatment. He has been ordered to Liverpool for a short time, and thence proceed direct to America.



Several of his officers have already left for New York.

THE "PASSAIC" TRYING HER LARGE GUN AT THE PALISADES, NOVEMBER 15, 1862.

IRON-CLADS.

We publish herewith, by way of contrast, the launch of the British IRON-CLAD "CALEDONIA," which took place at Woolwich Dock-yard on 24th October last; and likewise a picture of the experiment made on Saturday, November 15, with the great gun of the "PASSAIC," in the Hudson River.

The Caledonia was commenced in the year 1850 as a 90-gun wooden ship. After the battle of the Merrimac and Cumberland the British Admiralty abandoned the construction of wooden vessels, and the Caledonia was altered to become an iron-clad 34-gun vessel. She is 275 feet long, 60 feet beam, 26 feet hold, and 4125 tons. She is to carry two 110-pound Armstrong guns on the upper deck; on the main deck eight 110-pound Armstrongs and twenty-four 68-pounders. Her masts and bowsprit are to be of iron; and the hull of the vessel above the water-line, and for a short distance below it, is to be plated with 4½ inch iron. It will be seen that the only deviation from the old system adopted thus far by the British Admiralty consists in the plating of their vessels. They are still huge monsters, soaring high above the water, and presenting a target which the most inexperienced gunner could not miss; and which, at a proper distance, a 400-pound ball would penetrate as easily as card-board.

The recent trial trip of the Passaic was made to ascertain whether the great 15-inch gun could be fired without having the muzzle protrude from the turret. The previous trip showed that without some new contrivance the gun could not be fired within the turret without endangering the lives of the gunners by the explosion. To allow the muzzle to protrude was to expose the gun to injury, and would have required so large a port-hole that a shell might easily have been thrown in by an experienced gunner. To obviate these difficulties, Mr. Ericsson invented a machine, of which, for obvious reasons, we give no description. The following account of the experiment from the Herald will be read with interest:

On arriving at a point opposite Fort Washington the Passaic was headed to toward the western shore of the river, under the towering cliffs of the Palisades, when, reaching an unsatisfactory spot, it was determined to put the effect against the rocky bulwarks of the noble Hudson. The steamer was stopped, and the Dahlgren gun was loaded with twenty pounds of powder and a hollow shot. After the gun was run out to the side of the vessel and all was ready, it was fired, the ball ricochetting along the water a distance of about a mile and a half, striking the cliffs in its main flight, followed by a terrific echo, which, as the force resembled the explosion of a small magazine, made the noise outside of the turret seem terrific. The inside there was no concussion of any account, and the noise certainly did not exceed that which would have been occasioned by the firing of an ordinary pistol.

Every one was surprised and unwilling at the first trial to say much; all were anxious to see the effect of a full service charge of thirty-four pounds of powder. The capacity needed seventeen inches.

Second Firing.—The second time the gun was loaded with thirty-five pounds of powder and a hollow shot. It was fired, resulting from this in the same manner with a pleasant concussion, and, as before, there was scarcely any motion to the vessel. Several of the spectators were down in the turret at the first firing were outside this time to see the working of the shot, which had been pointed at a point who were outside at the time; but the noise outside was not greater than that which was heard within the turret at the time the gun was fired, and nevertheless the shot was discovered there through the remainder of the firing.

Third Experiment.—The third time the gun was discharged with thirty-five pounds of powder and a hollow shot. The result was only two feet more than before, the same results were obtained without trouble; in fact it was much pleasanter inside than outside of the turret. The motion was perceptible tending to discomfort either on the forth-deck or the engine-room.

Fourth Firing.—The fourth and last time the gun was fired it was charged with thirty-five pounds of powder, as we said, shot, the first one fired from a gun of this size with a full service charge. The result was precisely the same as the result being only two feet eight inches, and no motion of notice to the vessel.

Time ended the experiment with the gun, which in every respect was satisfactory. We refrain from giving the figures friends or the rebels the slightest clue as to how far the matter has been accomplished, but we will say in fact that it is the plan of Captain Ericsson, and that it has proved to be a perfect as it originally promised to be in all respects.

We will, however, give some of the general points in the working of the iron monitor, showing the value of the prominent features.

In the first place, their speed will be sufficient for the purposes for which they were designed. There is no doubt that they will go at the very least nine knots an hour, and, as no time will the guns of the vessel be liable to any damage from the projectiles of the enemy, as the vessels will not protrude outside of their shield. Thirdly, the number of men to each one of these monitors will be less than to work an ordinary 11-inch gun on a Merrity carriage. The monitor will run out the 15-inch Dahlgren, 40,000 pounds nearly twenty-one tons, as easily as nineteen men work an 11-inch piece. Also, the time taken to put a fourteen-ton gun in a cupola, but Mr Howard Douglass considered opposite to an hour, and we think that they would not require to get more than half that time. The time taken to run out a gun on the ordinary service can not be said to be less than from five to fifteen minutes, with perfect ease.

In these new Monitor batteries we give not only protection to the men, but to the guns, which, when the vessel has hit her, can be very readily brought inboard by the appliance to carry off the concussion and strike in single and independent, and the Government should look well to it to this secret get out, so as to be used by other Powers. It is a secret only second in the importance of the original Monitor.

The Passaic will be ready for sea within a week, and five or six of the other iron-clad Monitors about the same time. It may be taken for granted that the Department will lose no time in giving to the public the merits to the test. Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile will probably bear of them before Christmas.

McCLELLAN'S PARTING FROM HIS ARMY.

On pages 769 and 761 we publish a large picture of McCLELLAN'S PARTING FROM HIS ARMY. The following, from the Herald correspondence, will explain the scene:

This morning it was arranged that he should visit the troops in line, and proceed to Washington to-morrow night in the evening. When just about to go he said, "I can hardly bear to see you, my soldiers again." Accompanied by his officers and escort, a magnificent cavalcade, he rode off to take a farewell look of his troops. The line of cavalry attached to his head-quarters were tastefully disposed on an adjacent hill. The regimental bands played, by appearance. McClellan rode along the lines, and as he passed each regiment cheers spontaneously broke from the ranks. The soldiers could not restrain their overflowing admiration for their General. After he had ridden along the lines, and was returning toward the hill, General Patrick, commanding the Provost guard at Alexandria, rode up to the front, and, with cap in hand, in the name of the soldiers, presented a magnificent charger for General McClellan. The charger bears the name of Burnside, and from the time of his first campaign in Western Virginia, gave an extraordinary short sight of his capacity to carry his rider unwound, and gave one long, but lingering look, while he gave way to his old comrades in arms, and disappeared.

He then passed through the ranks of the reserve artillery. The batteries were all arranged in convenient positions, the commissaries standing by with their stores. The presumed palace, while the route mingled with their cheers as he passed. The magnificent artillery service of the army of the Potomac, which McClellan had created with so much care, he seemed reluctant to leave to the rule of Burnside. The troops of General Fitz John Porter's corps were marshalled in a magnificent array on the plain in front of the tents of General Couch's corps on the left. Butterfield's, Sykes's, and Humphrey's divisions of infantry were also disposed in order, the banners of each command superbly displayed. On the right of Couch's corps, Sumner's, and Franklin's divisions, in Couch's corps, were arranged in a somewhat similar manner, with the addition of both commands mustered on prominent positions, and the bands of each regiment stationed in front. He moved slowly from the position he was to leave for the last time, and his bands played him farewell. As he rode along the fortifications, the bands had ceased to play, and were followed by the glittering array of officers, fifty thousand of his devoted soldiers, with hearts overflowing with fast sadness, and all with one accord, burst forth into the most unanimous cheering I have ever witnessed. Above the continued acclamations of the fifty thousand, while from the distance we would occasionally catch, as though it were an echo, the sound from the troops we had left behind, and who were cheering yet, like after the General had gone away from the immediate vicinity of his headquarters. The banners before by the various regiments were held near the road as either side, and their tattered fragments were fully exposed to view between the General and party passed through the lines of troops. Some of the men were weeping like children, and others cheering and the ellers fringes left. A greater portion of the troops that had been shot away in battle under the gallant leadership of General McClellan. Those tattered banners, bearing inscribed upon them the names of the battles in which the troops had been engaged, and their fallen fellow-fields, were more yet most eloquent memorials of the mighty struggles which the Army of the Potomac had passed through. While he rode along the batteries fired salutes, the bands played, and the soldiers cheered with all the energy the soldiery fronted in among the perforated banners, and the acclamations of the troops, mingled with the inspiring music of the bands and guns. I am not recall from my experience any occasion on which I have witnessed anything to these soldiers has been surpassed.

Among the last to leave was Gen. Couch's lines, General Wilcox and party proceeded four or five miles further, to the rear of Franklin's corps. Here, on the crest of a hill, the very earliest fortifications of the winter, we said, near Franklin's corps. His arrival was the signal for calling the troops, and the commanders of corps. And then and there in General Couch's corps on the left. Butterfield's, Sykes's, and Humphrey's divisions of infantry were disposed in order, the banners of each command superbly displayed. On the right of Couch's corps, Sumner's, and Franklin's divisions, in Couch's corps, were arranged in a somewhat similar manner, with the addition of both commands mustered on prominent positions, and the bands of each regiment stationed in front. He moved slowly from the position he was to leave for the last time, and his bands played him farewell. As he rode along the fortifications, the bands had ceased to play, and were followed by the glittering array of officers, fifty thousand of his devoted soldiers, with hearts overflowing with fast sadness, and all with one accord, burst forth into the most unanimous cheering I have ever witnessed. Above the continued acclamations of the fifty thousand, while from the distance we would occasionally catch, as though

On the other hand, there are persons whose nervous system is tremulously alive to the aspect of pain; they will give you sigh for sigh, and groan for groan; they sympathize with you sincerely for the moment: as soon as you are out of sight they forget that you exist. Put yourself in their way, and rely upon their sympathy; when out of their way never count upon their aid. Benevolence is not always beneficence. To wish you may be benefited is one thing; to benefit you is another. A man who is benefient without sympathy, though he may not be a pleasant acquaintance, must be a good friend, and he who is sympathizing with without beneficence may be a very bad man. For there is a fascination of sympathy which comes from the impressionability of the physical system—a vibration of the nerves reacting on no chord of duty, and a tenderness so nervous as to commence ipapley of the heart. And a man may not be the less possessed of this weakness because he possesses an excitable nervous temperament.

Alexander Pierceau, the most ruthless of tyrants, to entered into the reverses enacted on the stage, that a tragedy moved him to tears. It is to him the very alkaloids in his Prologue to Addison's "Cato":

"Tyrants no more their savage nature kept,
And foes to virtue wondered why they wept."

Unfortunately Alexander Pierceau, in spite of his weeping, kept his "nature," which was probably more ferocious than that of "tyrants." A man of temperament readily impressionable, if accompanied, as it generally is, with a lively fancy, brings home to the mind's eye the scene or the danger which are represented to his senses, and for the moment realized by his fancy, thus it may be from fear for himself that a tyrant may weep at the representation of sufferings which, on the stage, depicted by the actor, he never can realize as a reality and the scripted hand. Now the same nervous temperament which is effeminately susceptible to pain, equally with sympathy may be made the subject to fear; and fear is akin to cruelty. For fear is the instinct of self-love, and cruelty may be who feels it compared with the power from which he apprehends an injury; and no saying is more true than that "cowards are cruel." "Les poltrons sont les vaincueurs forts en"—All cruelty springs from fear. Hence it is that the most cruel and sanguinary of these propositions in Nero, when his character is metaphysically analyzed. His was the excitable, the nervous temperament, subjugated entirely to fear to the effects of music, poetry, the drama, spectacle—insensibility to pain or sense was necessary to appeased for the moment to his senses. Thus, in early youth, a cultivator of the softest arts, and no cause of more terror yet manifested himself a restless imagination, he was doubtless sincere when, the sentence on a criminal being brought to him to sign, he exclaimed piously: "I wish I could not write!"—Would to Heaven that I had not learned to write!" But, as he grew older, and under the stimulate influences which, when fresh from the contemplation of scenes and harmless images, made him a fiend, he became subjugated entirely to the sensual pleasures, rendered monstrous in proportion as his sensibility to bleeding sores and pain became itself diseased: and, when the whole character was unmanned by the predominance of the sensual and the loss of even the intellectual and moral elements in man, all that was noblest in manhood, in exciting the internal consciousness of his own inferiority or weakness, excited his fear; for in silently rebuking, they seemed silently to threaten him—and fear made him almost tiger when scared into the relentless butcher. Yet, impressionable to immediate circumstance at the last as at the first, and by compassionate scenes he had at once known for the sentenced criminal, whose doom he had driven from appealing, returns to smite on himself. When the doom which had shocked his nerves to contemplate for another stands before him as his own, he weeps over his own fate, and trembles to inflict it. Just as in his youth sympathy being subject to the same influences under which he could bring home to his fancy the pain to be inflicted on another) made him forget the crime that was to be punished, so pity for the criminal that was to be slain, so now he wholly lost sight of his own crimes in the anguish of contemplating his own doom. And when, in forgetfulness of empire showed and remembrance of art cultivated, he was asked, "What an artist dies in me about to perish!"* he explained the enigma of his own nature. Besides the tastes which his hostile historians ascribe to him in painting and architecture, and a talent for poetry, which Suetonius is at some pains to deny, there was in him a real sensibility, eighteen hundred laurel crowns had Athens bestowed on him as a musician! If his career had been a musician's, and not an emperor's, he would indeed have been a voluptuary: a musician not unlike—(who could be unsupported, with a discriminative of that period, we had him warmly contrasted Robespierre as a young patriot, ready to sacrifice on the altar of his country as many hecatombs of fellow-countrymen as the Goddess of Reason might require. When I saw this ex-officio of the tribunal of blood, which was in London drawing-room, where his manners and address not generally known, he was a very polite, gray-haired gentleman of the old school of manners, addicted, like Cardinal Richelieu and Warren Hastings, to the composition of harmless verses. I have seldom met with any one who more instantaneously charmed a social circle by his rapid and instinctive sympathy with the humors of all around him by what he said, by any, rather than by action, easy with the young, caressingly respectful to the old. Fascinated by the charms of his address, as I was subsequently informed, by the same hand which, in the old regicide Frenchman of which we have heard so much and seen so little. Nothing changes like the spirit of the old régime."

Marvellous is the contrast between the actions for which this amiable gentleman had been commended to Robespierre and the manners by which he might have secured the Furies. I could not refrain, in the frankness of my temper at that earlier period of my life, from insinuating the question in what a bad school he had learned to be a happy a turn for innocent persons in the style of "Gentle Shepherd," and how he could have been led away by a participation of what I mildly termed "the excesses of the Revolution."

Such was this velvet-pawed tiger, "cut your ties-sour"—I always obey my heart! Sympathize with me, and I will pass on with you. Be it to-day with people who cry 'A bas les aristocrates!' ça ne monte le fait; je vocleverai le sang! And to-morrow with people who cry 'A bas la guillotine!'—eh bien! ça ne monte le fait; je vocleverai le sang!' And so on, and 'A bas la guillotine!' Sympathy is the law of my nature. Ah, if you had known Monsieur Robespierre!

"Here?" and I: "that is an honor I should not have coveted if I had lived for a year." I have hitherto supposed that Monsieur Robespierre was somewhat unsocial, reserved, frigid; was he, nevertheless, a man whose very soul was laid bare to the impulse to the liveliness of his sympathies?"

"Yes, indeed," was the reply that you would say, I have asked that question if you had studied the causes of his ascendency, or read with due attention his private letters. Robespierre, whose nature was not eloquent, as compared with his contemporaries, could have mastered his audience except by sympathizing with them. He was, in short, subject to fear; and fear is akin to cruelty. For fear is the instinct of self-love, and cruelty may be who feels it compared with the power from which he apprehends an injury; and no saying is more true than that "cowards are cruel." "Les poltrons sont les vaincueurs forts en"—All cruelty springs from fear. * "Quelle artiste," &c. "Artiste means something more than musician, by which word it is rendered in our current translations, and even something more than artist, by which it is rendered in the text. Artiste is a word of artifice, a courtesy; and I suspect that, in using the word, Nero had in his mind the Greek compound technites, once which had occupied his mind amidst all the terrors of his position, and destroyed him—a compound which really seems to have been a very ingenious application of means to an end, which may not have lost if Nero had been only an artificer, and not an emperor.

GENERAL McCLELLAN TAKING LEAVE OF

ARMY, NOVEMBER 10, 1862.—[See Page 759.]

PAST, PRESENT, FUTURE.

THE moon look'd down, and what did it see?
A deep vow breathed betwixt you and me:
One, a girl in her fair spring-time;
One, a man in his earnest prime.
A vow of friendship, and faith, and truth,
That should keep through years the pledge of youth.

The moon looks down, and what does it see?
A broken vow between you and me.
Careless words and a whispering tongue
A veil of doubt o'er the heart have flung;
Weakness in you, and pride in me;
Two several paths where one should be.

The moon will look down, and what will it see?
Two graves, two stones, for you and me.
Sad that immortal souls can play
With love, as a toy to be cast away!
Hard to get, and harder to keep!
This is the sight that makes angels weep.

TAKEN BY STRATEGY.

A THANKSGIVING LOVE STORY.

THANKSGIVING DAY! with a chill, gray sky, and sudden flurries of snow eddying through the air like flights of white birds! Who would give a fig for a sunshiny Thanksgiving Day? Why, one might as well have Thanksgiving Day without a turkey, as without its keen wind and fluttering drifts of scarlet leaves making their moan among the dimpled hollows of the lonely woods!

Deacon Jacob Marble fully appreciated the possession of both these necessary adjuncts to the day of national gratitude; and therefore it was that his brown, wrinkled face wore such an aspect of contentment as he stood before the looking-glass tying his checked silk neckerchief.

"We ain't rich people, Huldy," he slowly enunciated; "but I don't see but what we've as much to keep Thanksgivin' for as most folks. The harvests have been middlin' good, and things has gone pretty prosperous, considerin'—"

The Deacon's little wife interrupted this leisurely tirade in wifelike fashion, by standing on tiptoe to jerk out the clumsy knot that her husband's knobby brown fingers had constructed, and tying it trimly anew.

"There!" she said, complacently eying her work; "that's something like! You always take hold of a cravat as though it were the handle of a plow, Jacob!"

The Deacon looked down upon the bright eyes and plump cheeks of his helpmate with a broad smile that was not unlike a sudden gleam of autumn sunshine on one of his own sere harvest fields, as she stood there in the "go-to-meeting" costume of sober New England—a drab satin bonnet, with dark-blue bows inside, and a gray shawl wrapped cozily around her shoulders.

"Maybe your right, Huldy," said the Deacon; "but come—we shall be late to meetin'."

"Well, I'm ready," responded Mrs. Marble, briskly. "Bessy, be sure you watch the turkey, and keep it well basted—and put in the pumpkin pies when the brick oven is hot—and, Bessy, the pudding—and the stewed apples, Bessy—"

"There, there!" interrupted the Deacon, tucking his wife under his arm, and walking her off, yet in the full tide of her directions, "Bess will do well enough; she wouldn't be your daughter if she wasn't smarter nor a steel trap."

"How you do talk, Deacon!" ejaculated Mrs. Marble, looking uneasily over her shoulder. "I didn't remember to tell her about the chicken pies, arter all. Shut the gate, Deacon, or Joe Grimes's cows'll be in eatin' the tops off every chrysanthemum I've got. I wonder if the minister 'll preach any thing about the war; Deacon, don't you?"

And thus, divided between thoughts temporal and spiritual, the worthy matron went on her way under the wing of the Deacon's butternut-colored coat, toward the gray old church that nestled afar off among the desolate hills, its spire already obscured with a dizzy mist of snow-flakes.

Bessy Marble, thus left general-in-chief over the well-marshaled forces of the larder, stood quietly before the fire, tapping one dainty foot on the polished red-brick hearth, and thoughtfully playing with the string of coral that encircled her round, white throat. She was a dimpled, rosy little body, with lips like the scarlet geranium in the window, and dark-blue eyes full of roguish sparkles—a damsel, in short, whom you would have fancied created for the special purpose of being kissed and made much of. She knew it, too, the demure fairy, for there was coquetry in every fold of the crimson delaine dress she wore, and espièglerie indescribable in the fluttering bows of ribbon that fastened it! Right over the mantle, an old looking-glass—Deacon Marble would have stared if you had called it a mirror—reflected every dimple and rose-tint on the peachy cheek, yet Bessy never glanced at its flattering transcript. No—she looked gravely into the blazing heart of the fire with an unwonted dew before the blue eyes, and a pensive shadow on her brow.

"I say, Bessy!"

She had not heard the door open, yet she did not start when in the looking-glass she saw imaged another form besides her own—that of a tall, stalwart young man, in blue uniform, outlined with curves of vivid scarlet. He was a handsome fellow too, dark-eyed and sun-embrowned, with brown hair thrown carelessly back from his open forehead.

"Charles, you here?" she asked, half-reproachfully.

"Now don't scold, Bessy; there's a darling! I tried to keep away, upon my word I did, but you might as well expect a hungry bee to keep away from a bunch of honey-suckles—I couldn't stand it, and so here I am!"

And he passed his arm about her waist, and looked, with a species of laughing defiance, down into the blue deeps of her eyes.

"Don't, Charles!" she said, possibly alluding to a kiss, which terminated his words in a manner most satisfactory to himself. "When you know that my father has forbidden you the house!"

"Know it? of course I know it, and that's the reason I waited in the hazel copse until I saw the good Deacon well on his way to church before I walked in! But, Bessy," he added, in a graver tone, "you must own yourself that it is unjust for your father to dislike me simply for being poor. He was a poor boy himself when he married your mother; I've heard him say so a dozen times! And as for Mark Vernon—"

"Hush, Charles!" coaxed Bessy, placing her little hand over the young soldier's mouth. "You know that I never would marry Mark Vernon were he richer than Crœsus himself!"

"Heaven bless you for those words, love!" said the young man, earnestly; "and yet I sometimes fear—"

"Hush!" exclaimed Bessy, lifting her finger; "I thought I heard the gate shut."

"Only your fancy, darling. And, as I was saying—"

Rat-tat-tat! rat-tat-tat-tat!! thundered a pair of vigorous knuckles on the door—click, click! sounded the irresponsive latch, which Bessy had secured after the departure of her parents.

"It is my father—I know his knock!" gasped Bessy, in breathless trepidation. "If he should find you here, Charles! What can bring him back? Conceal yourself somewhere—the pantry, quick!"

"I can't! it's full of preserves and apple-barrels," said the fugitive, hurriedly surveying the premises.

"The kitchen then. Oh, do make haste!"

"Hang it, I won't hide like a burglar!" exclaimed the young soldier, half-laughing, half-defiant. "What have I done to be ashamed of?"

"For my sake, Charles!" pleaded the girl, as a fresh shower of knocks descended on the stout oaken panels of the door, and the Deacon's voice was heard clamoring for admittance. "Quick—he is going round to the window!"

Charles Mellen looked around, in a sort of desperation; the clock-case was too small to get into—the wood-box too narrow—the tea-kettle decidedly impracticable—and, spurred by dire emergency, the valiant son of Mars dropped on his knees, and scrambled nimbly under the old-fashioned chintz-covered lounge, or settee, that occupied the vacant space between the windows. There he lay, shaking with suppressed laughter, behind the ample valance of blue-and-white chintz, a sort of extempore "masked battery," while Bessy hasted to unbar the door.

"Thought you was asleep!" growled the Deacon. "I was just agoin' to try the winders! What on airth made you so long a comin'?"

"I thought—I did not know—" stammered Bessy, turning white and red alternately.

"Oh, you s'posed I was a robber!" said the Deacon, breaking into a genial laugh. "Gals does get the queerest notions into their heads sometimes. I've come back arter my spectacles, for I don't rightly feel as if I sensed what the parson said without I could look him full in the face, and besides, I like to foller the psalm-singin'. Where do you s'pose I could ha' left 'em? Last I remember havin' 'em I was settin' on that lounge, readin' the paper."

"No, no, they are not there," faltered Bessy, turning scarlet, as the Deacon peered about the chintz draperies. "Perhaps you left them on the clock shelf."

"Well, p'raps I did," said the old man, abandoning his first idea, greatly to Bessy's relief. "No I didn't, nuther. Good land! here they be, in my gray waistcoat pocket. Well, I am glad. I'll have to step spry though, if I calculate to overtake your mother before she gets to the meetin'-house. Bessy," he added, as his foot was on the threshold, "if you're really feared o' burglars, I'll give up the Thanksgivin' sermon and stay 'long with you."

"Oh no, father, indeed it is not necessary," said Bessy, earnestly; "I am not at all afraid."

And she closed the door on the Deacon's broad shoulders just as Charles Mellen emerged from the sheltering folds of his retreat, with a face of comic dismay.

"I was very nearly unearthed that time!" he exclaimed, with a peal of merry laughter. "Suppose he had taken it into his head to prosecute that search, and hauled out a young man instead of a pair of spectacles! Don't look so solemn, Bessy."

"Leave me, Charles," pleaded the girl—"leave me, you have no right here; and it would be far wiser, far better for us both, were you to go."

"But I haven't any idea of going," persisted the young soldier—"at least not just yet. Listen to me, Bessy darling—my own promised wife."

"I am listening," she said, half turning away her head, yet making no effort to withdraw the hand which he had taken.

"Bessy, I have not yet told you why I am here to-day. The fact is, that I have been away from my regiment quite long enough. The trifling wounds I received a few weeks since are entirely healed, and I am going to try my luck once more as a soldier of fortune. Bessy, my summons has come, and I must march to-night."

"To-night?"

The fair head drooped upon his breast with a low, bitter cry; the tears rained fast upon his soothing hand.

"To-night!" he repeated. "I may never return, Bessy, and I would fain have the right to call you wife before I go. Dearest, it would be such a strength, such a comfort to me! Will you deny me this, the last request I may ever make?"

Still she sobbed on, her head pillowed on his heart.

"I have loved you long and tenderly," he resumed, "and I should fight the better for knowing that my precious wife at home was praying for the absent husband. Bessy, may I go to the battle-field with this buckler of strength about my heart?"

And when she lifted her tear-drenched eyes to his he knew that the prize was won!

"But, Charles, when—"

"Now, dearest. Get your bonnet, and we'll place it beyond the power of earthly hands to break the bond between our two hearts. My own love, if a life's devotion can reward you for this hour it shall not be wanting!"

The fitful snow-flurries of the morning had settled down into a good old-fashioned storm—drifting, drifting, in white blinding clouds around the farm-house on the hill, folding the old stone fence in ermine wreaths, and ridging the roof-trees with alabaster. But within the pine-logs blazed cheerily on the hearth; and the Deacon, sitting in their genial glow, listened complacently to the hollow moan of the wind among the forests. In the shadow beyond Bessy was musing, her cheeks softly flushed and her eyes full of dreamy light.

"Bessy," quoth the Deacon, stooping to replace a log which had just fallen apart in a shower of bright sparks, "I've something to tell you, daughter. Mark Vernon had a talk with me this mornin', arter meetin'."

"Well?" she said, quietly, a shade of pallor creeping over her face.

"And he wants you to be his wife, Bessy—the mistress of his store-house and broad lands. What do you say, my child?"

"I can not be his wife, father. I am married already."

"Married!" repeated the Deacon, vaguely.

"To one, father, whom I have already given up to his country. I became Charles Mellen's wife while you were absent this morning; and he has left his bride to do a man's behest—to die, if need be, for the old flag, which he loves better than wife, or home, or life itself! Father, say that you forgive me; for I have only you and my mother left to comfort me now!"

Poor little Bessy! her short-lived courage gave way to a burst of tears; and when she lifted her wet eyes from the old man's knee she knew that she had not pleaded in vain.

"Bessy," said the Deacon, after a few moments' pause, "you've done a rash thing; yet I can't, somehow, find it in my heart to blame you, as perhaps I ought to do. I've always maintained that the men who go forth to defend the Union deserve to be rewarded with the richest treasures of our hearts and homes, and it's too late now to go back from my word. Cheer up, my girl! When Charles Mellen returns I shall not refuse to bestow my brightest jewel upon him!"

And thus it was that the soldier wooed and won his bride.

IN THE MOONLIGHT LONG AGO.

You love me well, I know, wife,
In spite of frown and toss;
In the moonlight long ago, wife,
You didn't look so cross;
In your little scarlet cloak, dear,
You tripp'd along the moss,
And all at once I spoke, dear,
Though sadly at a loss.

You hung your pretty head, then,
And answer'd very low;
I scarce heard what you said, then,
But I knew it wasn't "No."
My joy I couldn't speak, love,
But, a hundred times or so,
I kiss'd a velvet cheek, love,
In the moonlight long ago.

THE TENANT OF THE LUMBER-ROOM.

I HAD made up my mind to take an old house at Brocklehurst, if it suited me on inspection, and I hired a boy to pilot me thither.

"There," he said, as we came out of a thick fir plantation, and stood on the edge of a dreary broken bit of common covered with gorse and heath, "do you see the red brick house yonder by the gravel-pit?" I looked the way his finger pointed, and through the gathering twilight just discerned a long low building. "I'll tell you what, Sir," he said, in a low tone, and coming closer to my side, "there's not a lad in all the village would venture round there after nightfall, for there was murder done at that house not two years ago."

"Murder!" I exclaimed.

"Yes, and the cruelest murder it was too. An old gentleman used to live there—not so very old either, not much past sixty, I've heard say; but however that might be, he lived there quite alone, except for one young servant-woman, who kept his house. A pleasant-spoken lass Ann Forrest was, and many's the kind word she's said to me when she's been to mother's shop. She always seemed to take great care of her old master, and no wonder, for he was the best old man that ever lived, and a good master to her; but he had money laid by, and that must have tempted her, for one morning some laborers going past found the front-door open, the house deserted, and the poor old gentleman lying covered with blood, and quite dead, at the bottom of the garden. They say he used to go down there to smoke his pipe at night, and she chose that time, when she knew he could lay hold of nothing to defend himself with. An old iron box, in which the old man kept his money, and which only she knew where to find, was lying, turned bottom uppermost and empty, in the passage; and there were clothes and many other things scattered about the floor of her room, and in one of her drawers they found a long knife that she had hidden there. But they never found her; and from that day to this no one has heard of her."

It was a horrible story to listen to, with the black darkness closing round us, and the lonely house close by. We hastened on in silence across the common, down a dark steep road, and through some meadows, until we reached the house.

The clang of the bell echoed through the stillness within; then silence settled down once more. I waited long, then rang again, and at length there was a sound of steps and voices; at first, far away, then nearer. A key grated in the rusty lock, and the door was partly opened by an old man, whose short thick-set figure at once filled up the way, as though to prevent a hasty entrance. Behind him stood a woman, somewhat bent by age, and holding in her hand a lantern. Both stared at me in silent wonderment, as, addressing myself to the old man, I told my errand.

I said that I had meant to arrive sooner, but need give little trouble, as some bread and cheese and a bed for the night were all I should require. The man stood doubtful, as though half inclined to shut to the door in my face; then his mind changed, and without a word he took the lantern from his wife's hand, and, signing to me to follow, led the way across a bare and lofty hall, and along two stone passages, to a large kitchen, where a fire was blazing. Setting down the lantern on the table he turned round and said: "You'll maybe see that this is the kitchen. If you're too proud to sit here there are other rooms in plenty, but you'll find no fires or candles;" and without waiting for a reply he walked away. I turned to the woman, who had followed us, and now stood by the fire, and asked some question carelessly; but she answered me briefly, with a hurried glance at her husband; and, weary of attempting to conciliate, I said abruptly, that as my time was short I would see the house at once.

"There's very little you'll be able to see at this time of night," old Pearce said, gruffly, from the window where he stood.

"At least," I answered, "I can go through the rooms and get some notion of their size;" and I made a move.

For a moment it seemed as though they meant to let me go alone; then Pearce stepped suddenly forward, and harshly calling to his wife to bring the keys, caught up the light. Preceded by my unwilling guides I traversed long passages, our footsteps sounding hollow on the stone floors, mounted staircases, and crossed landings. We stopped from time to time while the woman unlocked the doors of empty and unshuttered rooms, where dust lay thick, and the feeble glimmer of the lantern only served to make the gloom and desolation more apparent. We went on in silence until we reached the foot of a narrow winding staircase. My conductors had begun to mount it, when I touched a door upon my right, and said: "Surely we have not been in here?" The man, half-way up, stopped and looked down at me. "No," he said; "it is only a lumber-room; the key has been lost this long while: if you wish to get in, you must have a fresh key made before you come again;" and he went on. It was a large rambling house, where you came suddenly upon cupboards and corners, and bits of winding stairs, or a step up here and down there, and passages with such queer turns and twists that one wondered whither they would lead; still there was something quaint about it that took my fancy greatly. When at last we got back to the kitchen a man sat by the fire unlacing his boots, and with his back toward the door. He turned as I entered, and displayed a muscular form and heavy face, like enough to old Pearce's to mark him as his son. He returned my greeting with a silent stare, resumed his seat, and pulling at his father's sleeve, muttered angrily: "And who on earth may yon be?" I did not catch the answer, but the gruff snort that followed was sufficiently expressive.

The woman set about preparing supper, and presently a repast of bacon, eggs, and beer was put before me; and while I was engaged upon it, she and her husband went away together. The son sat on watching me in silence for a while, then followed them, leaving me alone for the first time since I had come into the house. He and his father soon came back, but a change had come upon them; their sullenness was gone, and they seemed most eager to hear my intentions about the place. It was evident how much they feared that I might take it, and so deprive them of their home; and in this fear they caught at every doubt of mine, and tried to foster it. From their account, the place was hot in summer, cold in winter; it was even tumbling to pieces; and it almost touched me, when, turning to the son, I said: "And yet you seem to like to live in it!" to hear his curt answer: "I've been bred up here, and that makes a deal of difference." When the woman at last returned I saw that she had been crying very bitterly, and with a half-remorseful feeling I took a candle from her trembling hand and followed her up stairs. They had chosen for me one of the old state-bedrooms, on the first floor, and a long way from the kitchen and the hall, at the end of a wide gallery. She paused at the door to say that she hoped I might find all I wanted, but that if not, there was a bell, and giving me no time to answer, hurried off. I sat long, noting down in my pocket-book all I had observed, and pondering on various things, until the dull tones of the far-off stable-clock striking twelve aroused me, and I began to prepare for bed. Before lying down I went instinctively across the room to secure the door, and found, to my surprise, that I was without the means of doing so, for there was no bolt, and the key was not in the lock. For a moment I was startled; then I remembered that the keys of all the rooms had been on one large bunch, and no doubt the woman had forgotten to take this one off. Should I ring for it? I paused undecided; but the hour was late, the people must long since have been in bed, and I was strangely unwilling to encounter those surly looks again to-night. After all, it mattered little. Traveling as I did without luggage or money, and in simple, almost shabby dress, I had nothing to lose, and with health and strength in my favor, none would choose lightly to encounter me; and so, without disquietude, I blew out my light and lay down in bed. Still I was not in darkness, for the moon shone full into the room, only obscured from time to time as a heavy cloud swept across, and passing, seemed to leave it more clear and beautiful than ever. Gradually my thoughts turned into dreamy fancies, my fancies faded, and I slept soundly—for how long, whether for minutes or hours, I can not tell, but I woke in an instant, and with a sudden start and thrill. All was quiet—a cloud had veiled the moon, and the room was dark and still as death. No, not so still; what was that which, as I held my breath, came faintly on my ear? A rustling—so slight that I could scarcely catch it, yet surely a rustling in the far corner of the room. I was a man of strong nerves. In my youth I had been in perils both by sea and land, and I had ever kept my courage and composure. I did not lose them now. These men below might, despite the risk, be purposing to rob me; they might even, in their anger and revenge at my mission here, meditate worse things; but if the absence of the key had been no accident, and they were now in my room, they should find harder work than they had looked for. I had no fire-arms; but a loaded stick, which went with me in all my journeyings, was by my bed's head now. Slowly and cautiously my hand stole out in the darkness and grasped it tight. Then I waited. For a while there was perfect silence; then the sound began afresh, and there—there by the door, I could just see a moving form! On it came, then stopped, as though listening, and hearing nothing but my steady breathing, came on again, nearer and nearer, until, as it reached the foot of my bed, I sprang up. My stick was raised, was ready to descend, when the moon shone out again, and my hand dropped to my side, for a woman stood before me—not the old woman I had seen, but one many years younger, clad in dark garments, with pale, haggard face and wild eyes. What was it? a spirit, an escaped mad woman, or some plot to frighten me? As that last thought came into my mind I summoned breath to ask: "Who, in Heaven's name, are you?"

"O hush, hush!" moaned out a voice feeble and piteous as a crying child's. "Don't speak, don't let them hear!"

"They! Who are they, and who are you?"

"I will tell—I came to tell;" and with sudden vehemence the figure seized my arm in a convulsive grasp. "I am a poor creature, whom, for eighteen months, those wretches have kept imprisoned in this house, away from all who might have given me help. You are the first living soul who has been here; and I vowed to myself that if I died for it I would come to pray you to protect me; and oh, dear Sir, kind Sir, have pity on me!"

As she gasped out those words with passionate earnestness, yet in faint faltering tones, something seemed to tell me that this was no insane delusion, and no concerted scheme.

"My poor woman," I said soothingly, in a whisper low as her own, "I will help you if I can, but you must show me how. What is your name, and why are you here?"

"They brought me—I had seen them do it—no one else, and they dared not leave me behind to tell; so, when they had murdered him, they brought me here and shut me into the dreadful room up stairs. I am Ann Forrest."

The boy's tale, the Pearces's reluctance to let the house be seen, the closed lumber-room—those few words threw light upon it all, and in my horror I could not speak at first, I could hardly even think. At last I asked how she had freed herself.

"There were three rusty broken keys—I found them one day under some rubbish in an old chest up there, and I tried them all, and one fitted; but I dared not use it while they were always down stairs, and so I hid it again. They would have killed me long ago, but she—the woman—is kinder than the others, and would never let them, and to-night she talked and cried about your being here, and her husband's anger, little dreaming how I heeded her, for they think me almost silly now. But I did heed; and I thought that you would help me perhaps; and so, when I knew that they must all be in bed, I brought out my key and it unlocked the door; and then I listened outside every room until I found you by your breathing." She stopped at that last word, and looked at me with a wistful, searching glance. "I found you," she repeated; "and now, oh Sir, you will not forsake me."

"I will not," I answered; but when I paused to think a sense of our danger rushed upon me. Alone in this house, more than a mile from any human aid, how could I defend her or myself from men desperate, as these would be, if they only guessed that I knew their terrible secret? I, with a wife and children looking to me, had no right uselessly to peril my life. I must be cautious; and if it came to the worst, then I could but try what one strong arm in a good cause could do against two villains. So I spoke gently to the woman, holding her hand as she stood beside me, and trying to quiet her agony of terror and despair, while I said that I would save her, but to do it at this moment would not be possible. "Only wait till morning. Go back now to your prison, and trust to me." She started and shuddered.

"The key stuck in the lock; it would not come out," she said. "They may find it there, and then they will murder me, as they have threatened."

"Listen!" I whispered. "There is no sign that they have heard us yet. Go back and try—try with all your strength to loosen the key, and lock yourself in again; then you need fear nothing, for they can not guess. I will watch: if you need me, cry out, and I will come—if not, wait and hope for the morning that shall bring you safety and release; only go now, before they find us together."

She seemed to understand, and moved toward the door submissively, then stopped: "You would not deceive me?" she said. The look and tone were so imploring, so inexpressibly mournful, that my heart smote me for letting her go, for remembering any thing but her misery. She gazed into my face. "I know you would not," she said, in quite another voice, and again turned away, I following her. Her fingers softly turned the handle; she crept into the passage, and I watched the tall dark form flitting along the gallery, her bare feet moving noiselessly upon the boards. I listened breathlessly, but there was neither sound nor movement in the house. The old couple slept at the foot of the back staircase and near the kitchen, the son in a small room close to the hall, never dreaming that the prisoner they had kept securely all those months would find means to force her prison on this very night—only the woman even knowing that she had heard of my presence in the house. If any chance noise awoke those sleepers, if any chance suspicion had turned them into watchers, then it might be a struggle of life and death. No; all was still as yet. The moonlight flooded the room, as, closing the door, I softly crossed to the window-seat, and sat down there to listen and to think. Think—think of what? A horrible crime, a secret prison-house not twenty miles from London, the work that must be done to-morrow: all these things seemed crowded together wildly in my brain. By degrees I grew calmer. I must release her, but how? Many ways flashed across me, and were cast aside again; so I sat motionless, gazing into the sky, my ear strained for any cry, until the first faint streak of dawn came into the east. No sound had broken the dead silence of the house, and now at last my plan was made, and might be tried. I dressed quietly, then waited for a while, and as the red rim of the rising sun showed through the trees, tramped noisily down stairs. I meant that they should hear and see me, but no one appeared; so crossing to the kitchen, I looked in. The old man was there cutting up wood; he did not hear my step till I was close upon him, then turned sharply round. "You rise early," he said, in the old surly tone.

With all the blood in my veins curdling in sight of that wicked, murderous face I forced my lips to speak naturally. "Why, yes," I said: "I want to see something of the grounds before I breakfast. Can you tell me the best way to take?"

"I know naught about it," he answered: "there's nothing worth seeing any where about here."

"Where does the garden lie?" I asked. The instant I had spoken I felt that my question, meant to divert suspicion, had been a rash one. He looked up, a new expression in his eyes—was it fear or doubt?

"There is no garden now," he said, hastily; "it's a wilderness; and breakfast will be ready directly, if only that old idiot"—and he shouted his wife's name—"was here, as she should be."

The precious minutes were slipping fast away, and yet I dared not seem in haste. The old man had returned to his chopping, and the monotonous thud of the hatchet alone sounded through the room. Presently I said, carelessly: "Well, I'm just going for a turn in the wood now, and presently I shall get you to go round with me." I had not done speaking when the old woman's door opened, and I heard her foot beginning slowly to ascend the stairs. Was she going there? All might, perchance, be safe; but if that broken key should still be in the lock the secret was betrayed. In desperation I racked my brains for some device to bring her back. "Stay!" I exclaimed to the old man; "isn't that your wife? I want her to get me, if she can, some eggs and vegetables to take to town; I will pay well."

His eyes brightened, and absorbed in that promise, he never saw the agitation of my manner; he stepped to the door. "Meg," he called, "the gentleman wants ye. Come down, will ye?"

A pause; then she said from above: "I sha'n't be long."

I breathed hard.

"Come now," he called again; "the gentleman's waiting;" and then the foot came slowly down. A few minutes later, I saw her, with relief no words can tell, go off with a basket on her arm to the hen-house and garden. Now was my time, and there was not a moment to lose. Followed by old Pearce, I crossed the hall. As I stood waiting while he unfastened the door, the lad's words about the son came to my mind. He might be away; if so—if there were but this one man to face I would battle it out alone, and not leave her for an hour in their hands.

"I don't know," I said, carelessly, "whether your son's at home; if so, would he direct me, by-and-by, to Leekford, and carry my bag and basket?"

"Yes, he can go," was the reply.

That course, then, was hopeless, and I must try the other way. Slowly I sauntered along the wood-path, pausing from time to time to look with seeming interest at the trees and shrubs around me and back at the old house, and still that man stood in the door-way looking after me. At last I turned my head, and he was gone; but while within sight of those windows I dare not quicken my pace. A few steps more, and I was close to the old gate; I leaned upon it for a minute, then unlatched it, and passed through. All was still and quiet in the early morning light, save a rabbit bounding across the path and the rooks cawing overhead. I went on a little way, then stopped, and once again looked back. The old house was hidden now, and no human figure was in sight. Another glance, and then away like the wind through fields and woods, and over the common where a low red house stood in its solitude. On I went, into the fir plantation, through more fields, and then clambering a fence, made for a white house upon the brow of a hill near. That house, my boy guide had said, belonged to a Mr. Archer; and he had said, too, that he was a magistrate. Little as I had noticed his words at the time, all—the name, the place—had come fresh to my mind in my night-watch, and I was going there to ask his aid. On, on; and now my laboring breath was failing, and my feet seemed fastened to the ground; but still I struggled forward, and at last, thank Heaven for it! I had gained the door. Mr. Archer looked surprised; then led the way in-doors to a small study. In a few hurried words I told him all; but as I went on I saw the wonder in his face turning to disbelief, and the kind, thoughtful eyes involuntarily glancing now at my disordered dress, now at my flushed and agitated face. He thought me mad. With a great effort I composed myself, steadied my voice, and said: "You think this a wild story, but I swear solemnly that every word is true, and I call on you as a magistrate to give me help."

He was silent for a moment; then replied: "As a magistrate and as a man I should be bound to help if this were so; but pardon me, it does seem a wild story; and I should hardly like, without strong proof, to enter a man's house with such a charge."

I laid my hand upon his arm. "Listen," I said; "I can give you this proof only, that on the truth of what I say hangs my own character. If you go with me and find it false you have only been deluded by a madman or a rogue; if you refuse to go after my words, her blood and mine may be upon your head, for I, at any rate, shall instantly return there."

He hesitated, then said: "You speak strongly; and at least, as you say my going can do little harm, I am ready."

I stopped him again. "Not alone. Let some of your servants go with us. Not for my own sake," I added, as a half-smile curled his lip; "I only ask one man's aid; but I would not draw you into danger; and they are both strong men, and may have to be secured."

"And if not?" he said.

"If not, you have been deluded," I repeated.

"Very well, so be it," he answered.

Half an hour later Mr. Archer and myself, with two servants, stood before the door of Brocklehurst Grange. All seemed as undisturbed and quiet as when I had left it, hardly more than an hour ago. Was it as peaceful within? Were they still going about their daily work, expecting my return, while the solitary prisoner up stairs waited and watched for me in suspense that would be ended now? I rang, but no one came at first in answer to the summons. A terror seized me. Could they have murdered her and fled, leaving the house deserted? There had surely not been time for that. No; there were steps sounding on the floor, and the rattle of the door-chain as it fell. A moment more and I should know. The key turned, and the door was opened wide this time by old Pearce alone, quietly regarding us with the old sullen look and no more. They had guessed nothing yet, and now it mattered little that the three men by my side must show him all.

"You have had a long walk, Sir," he said; "and what may this gentleman want?" as Mr. Archer stepped forward.

I looked him full in the face. "He has come to take Ann Forrest from this house."

At that name I thought to see him turn pale or spring upon me, but no feature altered—no change came over the dogged face. Then all at once my heart misgave me. Mr. Archer looked embarrassed.

"I would not willingly," he said, "intrude upon you, or suspect you of the horrible crime with which this gentleman charges you; but he is so positive, that, if you can, you ought, for your own sake, to clear yourself."

Pearce looked at him unmoved. "You are Mr. Archer, of Holme Green, I think. Why you are here, and what this man means, perhaps you can tell, for I can not."

"This is what I mean," I said. "Ann Forrest, whose master you murdered two years ago, is now secretly detained in this house lest she should accuse you as the murderers. She is in the room which you call a lumber-room, and I am going there now."

"You are welcome to go there or any where, all of you, though I know no right you have to search this house. It signifies little to me what you do, and this is all of a piece with your conduct this morning;" and turning on his heel, he went back to the kitchen.

My companions exchanged looks, and I saw that the old villain's cunning words had strengthened their suspicions of me. That strange, that horrible composure, what could it mean? With a sick heart I led the way up stairs to the locked door where I had stood the night before; it was locked now, and above it hung the key. Could I have mistaken the place? No, there was the narrow passage just before me, the winding staircase above me and below. I snatched down the key, unlocked the door, and entered a desolate room half filled with boxes and old furniture; beyond it was another room quite empty, with no sign in either of human habitation. This, then, was what the old man's calmness meant; yet I searched, searched despairingly on every side, in every nook and corner, Mr. Archer looking on silently the while. All in vain! She was gone, and not a trace of her was left. I went into the other rooms; I left no spot unvisited; I groaned aloud in my bitter remorse for having left her to her fate. What had that fate been? That was the thought that lay heavy at my heart as we went at last to the kitchen. As we were about to enter it, Mr. Archer drew me aside.

"You remember," he said, "your own words when you brought me here. I have been patient; I have given you every chance; now comes your turn. For my sake and your own, as well as the men you have wronged, you must confess openly either to a cruel slander, or—"

"An insane fancy," I said, finishing the sentence. "Not yet. There are gardens and out-houses; I must search them. They may even have carried her off."

"How could they in broad daylight? You here till an hour ago and no cart or horse about the place—that at least is impossible. Besides, the man is here."

I said nothing in reply. What could I say? The old man was still alone and sitting by the fire as we passed through the kitchen to the back-door. He raised his head, and, pointing to a basket on the table, said: "My wife got those ready before she went to market. I don't ask if you have found any thing up stairs, because there was nothing to find; but I hope you are satisfied."

I was silent; but Mr. Archer paused to say a few words before following me out upon my fruitless quest. Every where, in lofts and sheds, summer-houses and stables, round the gardens and yards—on all sides I hunted, and hunted in vain. The fowls in the chicken-yard, the old dog in his kennel were the only living beings that met my eyes; and turning to Mr. Archer, I said, at last: "I give it up."

"And withdraw your accusations?" he asked.

"It is useless pressing them," I answered, bitterly; "but how can I disbelieve my own senses?"

"Even our senses may deceive us," he said, quietly.

I knew what he meant very well. His first step, when we returned again to the kitchen, was to go up to old Pearce and apologize gravely and formally for the disturbance he had caused. His next was to turn to me, saying: "There can be no further reason for my remaining; I will wish you good-morning, hoping that your painful impressions may wear off."

His words came in strangely with the thought in my own mind. Was it, after all, a dream, a delusion of my own, created by the lad's story and the desolate house? Had that midnight visit existed in my own fancy alone? Was Mr. Archer right, and was I going mad? With that horrible idea now first striking me, I stood silent until Mr. Archer again repeated his farewell. Then I roused myself. "Good-by," I said. "After all, you may be right, and I wrong. Stop!" And my voice in a new tone echoed through the room. I was standing by the window, and close to my right hand was a common kitchen cupboard, and at that very instant I had heard a moan come from it. I never could have heard it had I not been so near; I could hardly hear it now; but I turned and laid my hand upon the key, and as I did so the old man with an oath sprang up and rushed upon me. There was a confused struggle, a loud outcry, and he was on the ground, and I was wrenching open the door. It yielded to my strength, and there, on the floor of that narrow closet, bound hand and foot, and gagged, lay the poor woman for whom I had been seeking, powerless to move or cry out, though with help so near, and only able, by her desperate efforts, to utter that one faint moan which had just reached my ears. We lifted her up and unbound her, but she spoke no word, only her wild eyes roamed incessantly about, and she clung to me with a grasp that seemed as though it never would unloose. I and Mr. Archer led her away, leaving the two men to bring old Pearce afterward, for he made no resistance and only glared savagely round upon us all.

It was many hours before Ann Forrest could speak of what had happened to her; but that afternoon, in Mr. Archer's study, her hand still clasping mine, she told her dreadful tale—how in old times she had known the Pearces well, and once had even helped to nurse the woman; how they had asked her carelessly one day about her master's money-box and she had told them, not thinking any harm, and had never dreamed of any until the cruel deed was done. That evening she had been busy in the house till after nightfall, and then went down the garden to call her master in to supper; but as she neared the spot where he was wont to sit, she saw two figures bending over something on the ground, and as she stood to watch, saw, too, that it was her master who lay there, and running forward with a cry in sudden horror, had fallen the next moment stunned by a blow upon the head. She knew no more until she woke to find herself in the lonely room at Brocklehurst, and learned that they had brought her there to ward suspicion from themselves; that her life had for the time been spared, because the woman, bearing grateful memory of that old kind nursing, had vowed to tell all if they harmed her, and might have kept her vow; and so for all those terrible months one weak woman alone had stood between her and a frightful death. Of the end of that suspense, of the morning when the old man, coming up alone, had found the key, despite the frantic efforts she had made, still in the lock, and guessing the secret from that and from her terror, had bound and hidden her from her approaching deliverers, and arranging all things in her prison, had sent his wife and son away and staid himself on guard—of all this she could not even now speak without convulsive shudders, and we did not press her.

My story is well-nigh told. The father and son suffered for their crimes, the woman was mercifully dealt with. We did not take Brocklehurst Grange, for we could not bear that our innocent children should live in scenes darkened by such deeds; but we did go elsewhere. Years afterward there might be seen moving about our house a pale, tall woman, darkly dressed, gentle in manner, and very, very quiet. To her my wife turned for sympathy in every trouble; in her arms the children loved to lie when sick or sorrowful. From her I had the most faithful and devoted service; and she died at last, holding my hand, and thanking me with her eyes, even when her voice was silenced forever. Her name was Ann Forrest.

ONLY.

ONLY a woman's face,
In the dark night and cold,
But, oh! the ghost of a vanish'd grace,
And the pitiful tale it told!

Wrapt in a ragged shawl
(Why was it not her shroud?)
It look'd as white as the moon at night,
Through a rift in a driving cloud.

Only a few poor pence,
And a few kind words addressing;
And all they brought was a kindly thought
And a poor lost woman's blessing.

THANKSGIVING IN CAMP.

THE ADVANCE-GUARD OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC ATTACKING THE REBELS NEAR SUCKERSVILLE.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 770.]

REGINALD MARSDEN'S ATONEMENT.

ALICE GRAFTON, the gentle heroine of this brief record of real life, had been committed to her aunt's charge when her father, Captain Grafton, and his beloved wife sailed for India, where, after three years' residence, Mrs. Grafton fell a victim to anxiety and an unhealthy climate. At the termination of the Scinde war Major Grafton returned to England sick and wounded. His native air, the tender assiduities of his maiden sister, Laura Grafton, and his young daughter Alice, and the peace and tranquillity of an English home, partially restored his health. To the unspeakable joy of Alice he rallied for a time, and traveled with her and his sister for three years in Switzerland and Germany; but an old wound having opened afresh, from over-exertion, he returned to England in a precarious state. Feeling that probably he might not recover, he summoned to Atwood his old school-fellow and most intimate friend, Mr. Marsden, under whose guardianship, conjointly with that of Miss Grafton, he desired to place Alice. Mr. Marsden was accompanied by his eldest son, Reginald. It was during this visit that an incident occurred which had a powerful influence upon the after-life of the three persons concerned in the occurrence. Reginald Marsden, at that time eighteen years of age, had rescued Alice from drowning, and had also saved the life of little Jessie Moore, a motherless child, whom Alice, pitying her neglected state, had made her little attendant and companion.

This Jessie Moore was one of those bright little beings whose faces sometimes beam upon us from beneath the shadows of a rustic porch, or from out of a frame of foliage clustering round a cottage window. She had a fervent and enthusiastic nature, an intense love of the beautiful, and, alas! perhaps an innate distaste for the rough realities of poverty. Two years after the handsome, dark-eyed lady had saved her life, poor Jessie was taken away from her gentle young mistress to accompany a drunken, brutal father to London, where she was apprenticed to a West-end milliner. Before the first twelvemonth of this apprenticeship had elapsed Jessie disappeared, leaving no trace by which she could be followed. Alice Grafton had been cruelly distressed at hearing this bad news of her favorite. Too pure to impute evil, she attributed Jessie's disappearance to some ill-treatment or unkindness from her mistress or her father. Miss Grafton caused an advertisement to be inserted in the Times imploring the wanderer to return, and she consulted Reginald Marsden as to the propriety of searching further for the missing girl. But he had answered her letter coldly, telling her that all that could be done had been done, and that further interference in the business would be useless.

Shortly after this Major Grafton died, and nearly five years elapsed before Alice and Reginald again met. During the interval Mr. Marsden had died, and on Reginald now devolved the guardianship of Alice. Previous to her coming of age, a few law matters requiring arrangement, Mr. Reginald Marsden had paid a visit of some weeks at Atwood.

Alice and he had met with mutual pleasure. Neither had forgotten the beloved playmate of childhood. The delight they felt in each other's society was soon perceptible to Miss Grafton, who neither promoted nor discouraged the growing attachment, but allowed—how often the wisest plan!—things to take their own course.

The evening before he was to leave Atwood, Reginald asked Alice to take a favorite walk and view the sunset from a neighboring hill. Both felt that it was their last walk for a long time together, and both were sad and silent. As they were gazing on a splendid autumn sunset, "Alice," said Reginald abruptly, "as yonder sun sets below the horizon, so will sink the sun of my happiness when I leave Atwood. I am unworthy to claim even a friend's place in your pure thoughts, yet I must tell you what your influence over me has effected. Do you remember, even in our childhood, how your sweet pleading eyes could calm my wildest passions? and through the years during which we have been parted, never have I done wrong but their mournful gaze was upon me. And now I feel that henceforth you are my guardian angel. If ever I shall achieve any thing great or good it will be your work." Alice answered not, but her hand trembled on his arm. "Alice," continued Reginald, after a pause, "if in future years I become less unworthy of you may I—dare I—hope? Or if you withhold your love, will you at least think of me as a friend?" Alice held out her hand. "I will be ever your friend, Reginald," she said; "more I dare not say. It was my dear father's last wish, that before I promised more, a paper, which he left in your father's care, should be consulted." "That paper is in my hands now," said Reginald. "May I give it you to-night? But, Alice, supposing your father sanctioned our—our union, what would your heart answer?" Alice placed both her hands in his. Reginald covered them with kisses.

The paper that Reginald opened that evening contained a wish that Alice's choice might rest on one of the sons of his valued friend, Charles James Marsden. Alice lay down to rest that night doubly blessed in the thought that her father had sanctioned her love.

The engagement between Alice and Reginald rendered a visit to London absolutely necessary, and Miss Grafton wrote to her family physician and intimate friend, Dr. King, requesting him to engage apartments in the neighborhood of Russell Square, where he himself lived. Alice felt a childish pleasure in this visit, and she determined to seize the opportunity of endeavoring to gain tidings of her lost protegée, Jessie Moore.

A happy month had passed away, almost like a dream, so swiftly had the days flown by in quiet visits to the picture-galleries, museum, and concerts; Alice always happy with Reginald by her side to direct her judgment and improve her taste. In the bright days of early summer they made frequent excursions to favorite spots within easy access of the metropolis. Charles Marsden now paid a visit to his brother; and by his cheerful manners and well-stored mind made a pleasant addition to the party. Though less accomplished and fascinating than his brother, Miss Grafton preferred Charles to Reginald, and wished that her niece's choice had fallen on the younger brother.

But Alice loved Reginald with the unquestioning devotion of her earnest, enthusiastic nature, with the perfect trust of an innocent heart. The very essence of this trustful first-love is its faith in the worthiness of the beloved. Shatter that quiet confidence, that perfect reliance, and you strike a blow to the very root of love. Pity, regret, sympathy, affection, may remain; but the love that has faith has perished.

Alice and her aunt sat one evening in their pleasant drawing-room, overlooking the Foundling Gardens, expecting Mr. Marsden, who came every evening, from his chambers in the Temple, to drink tea with Miss Grafton and her niece. Alice was silent, but it was the silence of content. She had spent the previous day with her aunt, Reginald, and Charles at Windsor. The splendid old palace and the noble park had claimed their admiration. They had rambled round the lovely Virginia waters, and lost themselves in the spreading forest, with its bright oases of flowers. A bright June sun had wrapped the young foliage in radiance, and with sunshine in their hearts and around them, they had all agreed that it had indeed been a most happy day. Many years passed before one of them could remember that day without a pang.

Alice sat at the window listening for Reginald's step, when a poorly clad, but respectable-looking woman caught her attention. A double knock sounded on the door below, but was not the familiar rat-tat, every stroke of which was music to Alice's ears. Mr. Charles Marsden was announced, the servant adding that a poor woman was waiting below, who begged to see Miss Alice. Charles brought his brother's excuses, whom earnest business detained at his chambers. Alice, with a sigh, went to the woman. In less than ten minutes she returned to the drawing-room. "Aunt, dear," she said, "I want Charles to go with me a little way; I think we may, perhaps, hear something of poor Jessie. Charles, will you come?" Mr. Marsden gladly assented.

"Charles," said Alice, as they left the house, "I did not wish to alarm my aunt, but I fear something terrible has happened to poor Jessie. Look here!" She handed him a slip of paper, blotted with tears, containing these words:

"Dear Miss Alice, I am so very, very miserable that, weak and guilty as I have been, I know you will pity me. Last week I saw your sweet face as you got out of a carriage, but I dared not speak to you—you so good and pure, and I so fallen and wretched. Oh, why did you not let me die six long years ago? When I saw you I resolved to write and entreat your pity for my poor baby, but it is useless now." The poor scrawl broke off abruptly, and the last words were almost illegible, so blotted were they with the tears that had fallen upon them.

It was a mean, narrow street to which the woman had directed Alice. She was watching for them at the door of a poor-looking house, and conducted them up a narrow, close staircase into a small room, which was scantily furnished, but neat and clean. In a cot lay a pretty child, about twelve months old. A smile rested on the little thin face, but the eyes were closed in death. Alice's tears fell fast as she looked at it, and listened to the woman's sad story of its mother.

"She was quite a young thing, Miss, though so pale and wan. She came here just before baby was born, nigh a twelvemonth back. How she did dote on it, to be sure! She was so sad, and never would speak to any one but me; and I think she took to me because I noticed baby. It was a nice little thing, with beautiful dark eyes; but it never throve. It had been ill some days, and its cries distracted its poor mother. Yesterday she said to me, 'Baby must have a doctor. I want you to go to such a house' (your house, Miss), 'and see Miss Alice, and tell her that little Jessie Moore, that she was so kind to years ago, entreats her to send a doctor to her little boy.' Then she told me, Miss, how you tried once to save her from drowning, and how she wished you had let her die then, that she might have been spared so much misery and sin. This morning, quite early like, she knocked at my door; never shall I forget her look as she said, 'Baby is dead! I am going out.' She was quite calm, and didn't shed a tear, but her eyes looked wild like. I went up—I soon went up to her room, and there lay the poor little thing dead. I washed and dressed it, and laid it in its little cot; all day I watched and waited for its poor mother to come back, but she never came. So I thought, Miss, I would make bold and come to you, as mayhap you might have seen her. I found the bit of paper with name on it, and there is another letter or something on that table, if you would please to look at it."

Almost mechanically Alice moved to the table, followed by Charles. The letter of which the woman had spoken lay there open, as the wretched girl had left it when she rushed from the house. At the same moment their eyes rested on these words: "Abandoned by you, I had still my child to cling to: it is dead; I can bear life no longer! May God have mercy on us!—JESSIE."

"I think this is the address, Miss," said the woman; "I took a letter for her there once, soon after baby was born. How she did long for an answer, poor thing! but it never came." The woman held toward Alice a torn, crumpled envelope; the name upon it was Reginald Marsden, Esq.

Alice took the crumpled paper from the woman's hand, and gazed at it with a strange, half vacant stare. Presently, rousing herself as from a trance, she whispered, "What can we do? think for me, Charles, for I can not."

Charles Marsden's first thought was to hurry Alice away. As they left the house they met Dr. King. "Dear Miss Alice," said he, hurriedly, "I have just left your aunt; I called to tell you that I think I have found your Jessie. It is a sad tale, though. A poor young woman, picked up out of the river, was brought to the hospital just as I was leaving to-day. The house-surgeon asked me to see her. It was a long time before they could get life into her again, so I tried a remedy which I once found succeed when other means had failed. Gradually she came to, and was able to speak before I left. As the nurses were chafing her hands a ring fell off. I took it up, and inside were engraved the words, Jessie M. Moore, I think you told me was the name. This poor thing does not look more than eighteen, so it is very likely your Jessie. But if you do not mind coming with me to-morrow, you can judge for yourself." The doctor soon left them.

"Charles," said Alice, "I can not go in just now, let us walk round the square."

They walked up and down the smooth gravel path for some time in silence. Charles Marsden looked, from time to time, at his companion's sweet face. It was as white as death, but as calm as the face of an angel. No tears quivered upon the soft dark lashes that drooped over the tender blue eyes; the delicate mouth was now and then disturbed by a faint, tremulous motion, painfully expressive of the speechless grief which had fallen so heavily on the untried heart. At last she murmured, rather to herself than Charles, "Oh, how dreadful the thought that he should have been guilty of such cruelty—such dishonor! Jessie—the girl whose life he saved, whom he knew in our happy home!"

Charles attempted not to console her; he felt too keenly that he could give no comfort here. No mortal voice, no mortal pity, could console her in such a grief as this. How mournfully they paced those pleasant leafy inclosures which Alice had looked upon so lately from her open window, listening to the merry voices of the children, and taking a pleased interest in their games! And now, in the bitterness of unutterable sorrow, she looked back at her past life, and wondered at its happiness. After a long silence she stopped at the gate of the inclosure and gave Charles her hand. "No one must know this but him," she said; "I will take care of Jessie. Charles, I trust to you."

When Alice re-entered the house she found her aunt occupied with some friends, and, leaving them together, she retired to her room—retired, not to sleep, not to think, but to pray. A dreadful blank had blotted out the bright picture of her life, yet she thought not of that, she thought only of Reginald and Jessie; with her whole heart and strength she pleaded for the guilty and the unhappy. She thanked God, oh how fervently! that life had been spared. A holy calm at length succeeded the agitation of her spirits; she rose from a sleepless couch and opened her window. The cool air of early morning fanned her heated cheek; the first bright streak of dawn shone through the trees, and shed a ray of hope on her heart. It seemed like a bright messenger from heaven sent to bid her not despair. She lay down and slept.

With a calm demeanor but a beating heart Alice accompanied Dr. King to the hospital. In a small room off the accident-ward lay Jessie, a blank image of despair. She raised her hot, heavy eyelids as the doctor entered, but when she saw Alice a burning flush suffused her features, and she covered her face with her hands. Alice bent over her in silence. At length a tear fell on the bowed head, and a tender voice murmured, "My poor Jessie!" The doctor left them together.

Tears now trickled through the thin fingers that were clasped before Jessie's face. "Dear Miss Alice," sobbed the wretched girl, "if you knew all, you too would shun me; you would shrink from me like the rest, and—"

"Hush, Jessie, not now," murmured Alice, in a soothing tone; "when you are better you shall tell me all. God has been very merciful in saving your life, and in bringing us together. In our greatest trials He will not forsake us if we trust in Him."

"Yes, you who are so good, but I—" A gentle hand covered her mouth.

"I have not had your temptations, my poor girl, but I too have suffered." The anguish of the tone went to Jessie's heart. The hand was pressed fervently to her lips. "Listen to me, dear Jessie," Alice continued more calmly. "You are very weak now, quiet alone can restore you. Leave every thing to me. I have seen your little boy."

Another flood of tears came to Jessie's relief, and Alice wept with her. With the quick perception of affection Miss Grafton soon perceived that Alice suffered from a deeper rooted grief than she could naturally feel from poor sinning Jessie's misfortunes. She missed from her niece's finger the ring that Reginald had given her, but she forbore to solicit a confidence that was not freely given, and with the tact of true sympathy avoided all allusion to Mr. Marsden. Poor Alice felt that hers was a grief too sacred even for affection to share.

In the evening Charles Marsden called, and he also shunned all reference to his brother, except while Alice was out of the room, when he apologized to Miss Grafton for Reginald's absence. When he left, Alice followed him into the hall, and gave him a small packet for his brother. It contained the ring.

That evening Jessie Moore was seized with the wild delirium of a brain fever. It was an anxious time for Alice and her aunt, who both spent many hours by the sufferer's side; and when reason at last returned tried every means in their power to soothe and cheer her. When all danger was over, Miss Grafton proposed to Alice that they should leave London, and go for a few weeks to the sea-side, and at Alice's request took a lodging near them for Jessie Moore, whose unaffected penitence had secured for her the pitying tenderness of the kind old lady. Once Miss Grafton spoke to her niece of Reginald Marsden: "I take it for granted, dear Alice, that all is over between you and Mr. Marsden. I seek not, darling, to know your secret, and I have such confidence in your strong sense and noble heart that I am sure that it is no girlish pique, no foolish misunderstanding, that has separated you." "It is not, indeed, my dear aunt." "And Mr. Marsden submits to your decision?" asked Miss Grafton. "He does; because he feels that I am right. The secret is of so painful a nature, dearest aunt, that if you would make me happy, pray never speak of it again."

Settled quietly at Eastbourne, it was a balm to Alice's heart to watch the bloom of health gradually return to poor Jessie's wasted cheek. The sea-breezes invigorated her drooping frame, and the sweet companionship of Alice elevated and strengthened her mind. Like most English women, Alice was undemonstrative; her mind, like her beauty, was less suited to dazzle the imagination than to win the heart. She had loved deeply, devotedly, yet she could judge justly for herself and others. The calm strength of her character, her firm trust in Divine love, gave her an unconscious influence over all who loved her.

Jessie, warm-hearted and impetuous, with more vehemence of character, and a far less regulated mind, clung to her with childlike devotion. Alice also rejoiced in the love she had inspired, and strove, like a ministering angel, to pour balm into the wounded heart, to awaken Jessie's mind to a just sense of the duties and responsibilities of life, and inspire her with that faith in the Divine love which shed so bright a light over Alice's own path.

Jessie's story was listened to with gentle pity, but never referred to afterward. Before she left London Alice received one communication from Reginald. He wrote thus: "Teach me what atonement I can make to you and to her. I can not love her, but I will marry her if you think it right."

When Jessie opened her heart, Alice had said, "Jessie, if he offered to marry you, not loving you, but from a sense of duty, would you marry him?" Jessie murmured, in a broken voice, "If his child had lived I might have answered Yes; but it is so different now. Do not think me proud, dear Miss Alice, but I can not accept his pity." Alice conveyed Jessie's answer to Reginald, and only added these words: "Jessie is my charge now."

Alice and her aunt now consulted seriously on Jessie's future. They thought it best that she should make a living for herself. She had a fine soprano voice, which, if cultivated, might give her independence. Alice's former singing-master was willing to receive the penitent girl into his family, and give her instruction in singing for three years, at the end of which time she might be able to gain her own living. Jessie parted with her noble young protectress with tears of gratitude, and resolutely and industriously began her new career. Mr. Leslie was so well satisfied with the beauty and flexibility of her voice, and pleased with her aptitude and gentleness, that he begged that, if he succeeded, as he hoped, in preparing her for a first-rate concert-singer, she would come out under his name.

Alice and her aunt went home to resume their old life at Atwood. Years passed on. Miss Grafton and Alice often saw Mr. Reginald Marsden's name in the newspapers as leading counsel in the Northern Circuit. He had early gained some standing in his profession. His ambition was gratified, Alice thought, but was he happy? Charles occasionally paid them a visit. He had for some years left college and entered on the duties of a country clergyman. An old friend of his father had given him a small living in a pretty Somersetshire village. He confided to Alice his own plans and prospects, but he dared not venture to speak of his brother's.

A half-yearly visit to Atwood and a regular and intimate correspondence only increased Jessie's devotion to Alice, who was her guide, her counselor, and friend. And when in her profession her great beauty and brilliant voice laid her open to flattery and temptation, the memory of the one blot on her early life, and the love of the gentle being who had rescued her from ruin, preserved her from danger. Mr. and Mrs. Leslie, who had no children of their own, were as proud and almost as fond of her as if she had been their daughter, and she still resided with them. Six years had passed when Alice received a letter, written in a hand whose well-known characters she could not even now trace without emotion. It contained these words:

"Forgive me if I dare to break the long silence between us. For the pain which you suffered six long years since I ask not forgiveness. I can not forgive myself. In the calm sufficiency of your own pure life you can not realize the desolateness of mine. The bright hopes that I once cherished blasted through my own crimes, I shunned society and wrapped myself in my profession. I gained repute which brought no satisfaction, for I was alone. An angel once blessed my path; and though my own guilty madness had forfeited the blessing, still the memory of that pure love rendered all mercenary and unholy ties odious.

"You are, and have been for years, the loadstar of a far nobler heart than mine. I would not have it otherwise. Still there is one who once loved me whose tenderness I feel I could repay with devotion if she would only let me make reparation for the dreadful past."

This letter caused Alice much anxiety. There could be so little sympathy now between the misanthropic barrister and the beautiful songstress, whose short career in public had been one ovation of applause. True, Jessie still wore the ring he gave her, and Alice thought that, at all events, they had better meet. She therefore begged her aunt to invite the two brothers to meet them at Christmas, which festive season Jessie was to spend at Atwood. Miss Grafton, not a little surprised at the request, acceded to it, and sent an invitation to both the brothers.

One evening Reginald Marsden sauntered into Exeter Hall. It was unusual for him to visit any place of amusement, as he shunned any chance of meeting with his former friends. He was late, and seated himself under the orchestra. A lady was singing one of the beautiful airs of the Messiah. The earnest tones of the pure, clear voice seemed like a breath of the past, wafted over his hard, joyless life, summoning him to a higher existence. His heart was softened; he longed to live a different life. Experience with them therefore, left the hall without even casting a glance at the singer.

It was a snowy afternoon when Charles and Reginald Marsden arrived at Exeter, and proceeded on the branch line to Atwood. The train, impeded by the snow, which had only been partially cleared from the line, moved slowly on. It had nearly reached the Atwood station when the danger, which sometimes, and a red light gleamed in the distance. There was a sudden jerk—a crash. The engine was off the line. Shrill screams arose, and now arose on all sides. Lights and help were quickly on the spot. The two carriages next to the engine were shattered; several persons were seriously injured. Charles Marsden was not hurt. Reginald was slightly wounded.

An invitation to Atwood had been Alice's only answer to Reginald Marsden's letter, but he understood her sufficiently well to felt that she knew of his wishes, and that he should meet Jessie Moore at Atwood. It was with strange, conflicting emotions that he had looked forward to meeting her and Jessie, and began the journey which had ended so unhappily.

Alice and her aunt were momentarily expecting the brothers. Their pretty drawing-room, gay with winter foliage—for Miss Grafton loved old Christmas customs—was lit up by a crackling log fire, which gilded even the snow-covered shrubs round the bay-window. A noise was heard entered hurriedly, and said, "James has just come back, madam, and says there's been an accident on the railway, and one of the Mr. Marsdens is hurt."

Send James instantly with the carriage for Dr. Wimbush."

In half an hour the carriage returned, and Alice, with a footstool under her, held Reginald's head still insensible, carried into the house. The doctor was with him, who said the internal injuries were not dangerous; the brain was not affected, slightly, he hoped. Great care and quiet were needed. An hour elapsed before consciousness returned.

For a month Reginald was confined to his room. Alice, with thoughtful kindness, had put off Jessie's visit, who happened to be with friends not in Edinburgh, and so did not hear even of the accident, and Alice had given her no intimation of whom she was likely to meet at Atwood.

Charles had been obliged to return to his parish duties. It was with a sad, yet strangely pleasant feeling, that Reginald had, through his illness, felt himself the object of unceasing care from Miss Grafton and Alice. It was pleasant to know himself dependent on them alone.

Miss Grafton paid him daily visits; brought him books of Alice's choosing—not the religious poetry that they had once read together, but Spenser, Longfellow, and those womanly writers who have strong plain truths in them. There was such a home-like feeling, too, at Miss Grafton's. Reginald thought with a regret of going out into the world again; his world of toil and money-getting, where men's wits are sharpened and their hearts turned to stone. He trusted there might one day be a link between Alice and himself; not the one he breakfast-table, but a link which should be like that which Charles being together, and had once or twice from his window watched them walking in the shrubbery.

With a languid step Reginald, for the first time, entered the drawing-room. Alice was at the very pale, and held out her hand. They looked into each other's face. "What a change in her!" His white lines of care and thought deeply graven on his features, bagged with recent illness; she with the traces of a deep sorrow on her sweet face. She wheeled a chair for him to the fire, and gently expressed her pleasure at his recovery. For some minutes he could not speak; at last, with a trembling voice, he muttered, "Alice, your forgiveness." She gave him her hand. His hot tears fell on it, as he bent over it and pressed it to his lips.

On the next evening Alice, her aunt, and Reginald were in the drawing-room. The drawing-room, in the dusky winter twilight, when Miss Leslie's arrival was announced. The young ornest-lamps, the elegant-looking women, greeted Alice and her aunt with the warmth of gratitude and affection; then, seeing a stranger there, Miss Grafton hurriedly introduced Reginald as a friend who had met with an accident on the railway. Mr. Marsden and Jessie looked surprised with the cold recognition of strangers. Alice drew her friend away—they evidently did not wish to see each other—she would tell her quietly next day. How daintily Alice arranged poor Jessie's collar and hair in the pretty little bedroom which had been prepared for the expected visitor! Jessie smiled at the trouble she herself took to look her best toilet. Certainly the beautiful face and graceful figure needed not the ornament of dress.

They entered to the drawing-room. The lamp had not yet been lighted. Reginald Marsden was seated in an easy-chair, between the fire-place and the piano, which had been moved into the cozy corner, close to the angle of the chimney-piece. The red blaze of the fire rose and fell, sometimes vividly illuminating the chamber with its cheerful light, sometimes leaving all in shadowy obscurity. Jessie and Alice seated themselves near the window and at a considerable distance from the invalid. Presently, however, in the course of an animated conversation about music, the young songstress alluded to a duet which she wanted Alice to learn.

"I have arranged your music on the piano, dear," Alice said. "Will you fetch this wonderful duet?"

Jessie glanced shyly at the fancied stranger; but rising from her pet, crossed the room toward the open piano.

Reginald watched the graceful figure with a listless glance; but as she approached him he listened suddenly upward, and for a moment all was as bright as day.

Reginald Marsden started from his half-reclining position as if he had seen a ghost.

"Jessie, Jessie!" he cried, "Jessie!" "Jessie, Jessie! my wronged, unhappy girl!"

His fall on his knees at her feet, lifting his pale face toward her own. He remembered nothing but her sorrows and her devotion.

"Alice," he cried, "Alice, proof of my life, this is your work!"

"It is, Reginald," sobbed Jessie; "but for that noble friend I should indeed have been utterly lost."

That you have been saved, Jessie, and it is not yet too late to atone. Alice has taught me my duty. My poor girl! to think that I should not have known you!"

Two months later there was a quiet wedding. Charles Marsden, Alice, and Miss Grafton alone were present.

Mr. and Mrs. Marsden went to pass some months in Italy. Reginald's constitution had sustained too severe a shock to permit him for'a long time to resume his profession, even if he should ever be able to do so. He had a little more than an annuity would be obliged to give him large changes; still he was rich with honest pride that she too could contribute to his support.

A few weeks after the wedding Alice received the following letter:

"DEAR ALICE,—Feelings of delicacy toward you, and of pity toward my brother, have made me look up in my heart for words to express my thanks for your kindness, which to have revealed would have been the happiness, the glory of both. But I am not a man of words, and I ask not for that angel's love you once felt for another. I am a lonely man, and would cheerfully have given my life to have saved you one page. From boyhood you have been the object of my life. Alice, I love you with the whole truth of my soul—with the whole strength of my being. Will you accept this love?

"CHARLES."

In a few months there was a second wedding, at single in the drawing-room at Atwood. Alice was immediately afterward Alice and her aunt left Atwood, and went to live at the parsonage-house of Charles Marsden's new parish.

Facts about Brandreth's Pills.
NEWCASTLE, WESTCHESTER CO., N. Y., Oct. 31, 1862.
MR. G. THE REV. SHELDON, Editor Sing Sing Republican:
DEAR SIR.—I would state that I was induced to use BRANDRETH PILLS through the recommendation of my John R. Swift, of Croton, Westchester County, who was entirely restored to health by their use. He was afflicted for over two years, very severe and dyspeptic, and he tried everything, but was not relieved. Finally, he took one box according to directions, and was so much relieved in a few days that he continued to use them, and then took one Pill every day, with occasional doses of six. In one month he was entirely restored to health, and in three months he was gaining 40 pounds in weight.
Yours truly,
EDWARD PUDDY.

WESTCHESTER COUNTY, ss.
Before me, a justice of the peace, duly sworn, says that he resides in the town of Newcastle; that some years ago he was very sick with a sore on his leg, which had been running for over five years; that he was also much distressed by a pain in his chest, and besides was very costive and dyspeptic; that after trying various remedies and many physicians, he commenced using BRANDRETH PILLS, and in about three times a week, and at the end of one month the sore in his leg healed, and at the end of two months he was entirely cured of costiveness, dyspepsia, and pain, and has remained well ever since.
Sworn to before me, this 19th day of October, 1862.

OLD MOTHER BUCHANAN AT WHEATLAND

(Composure Richard III.)

O, coward conscience, how dost thou afflict me!
The lights burn blue. It is now dead midnight;
Cold fearful drops stand on my trembling flesh.
Is there a murderer here? No. Yes; I am.
Then fly—What! from myself . . . .
I am a villain. Yet I lie, I am not.
Fool, of thyself speak well. Fool, do not flatter.
My conscience hath a thousand several tongues,
And every tongue condemns me for a villain.
Perjury, perjury, in the highest degree,
Murder, stern murder, in the direst degree,
All several sins, all used in each degree,
Throng to the bar, crying all—guilty! guilty!
I shall despair. There is no creature loves me:
And if I die, no soul will pity me!

FOLLOWING THE DRUM.

"Kiss me good-by, my dear!" he said;
"When I come back we will be wed."
Crying, she kissed him, "Good-by, Ned!"
And the soldier followed the drum,
The drum,
The echoing, echoing drum.

Rataplan! Rataplan! Rataplan!
Follow me, follow me, each true man;
Living or dying, strike who you can!
And the soldier follows the drum,
The drum,
The echoing, echoing drum.

Proudly and dimly marched off the men,
Who had a sweetheart thought of her then;
Tears were coming, but brave lips smiled when
The soldiers followed the drum,
The drum,
The echoing, echoing drum.

One, with a woman's curl next to his heart,
His full hair half smile pierce like a dart;
She thought "death in life" comes when we part
From soldiers following the drum,
The drum,
The echoing, echoing drum.

THE FRENCH PROPOSAL TO MEDIATE.

MONSIEUR DROUYN DE L'HUYS, the new French Minister of State, appears to have inaugurated his accession to power by a proposal addressed to the British and Russian Governments, to the effect that they should mediate in our war. We are not yet in possession of the precise terms of the proposal. But we gather from Earl Russell's reply that the French Government, anxious to avert further effusion of blood, and further sufferings by the workingclasses in Europe, proposed to the British and Russian Governments that they should jointly tender their good offices as mediators to the Government at Washington, and simultaneously to the insurgents at Richmond, with a view to ascertain whether some adjustment of the pending strife could not be discovered. It does not appear that the French offer went any further, for Earl Russell in his reply observes that "a refusal from Washington at the present time would probably not greatly remove the difficulties of the Government:" from which it may fairly be inferred that it was not proposed to follow up unsuccessful attempts to mediate by armed intervention.

This proposal Great Britain declined to entertain, as appears by a dispatch which Earl Russell dated November 13; for the reason that "there is no ground at the present moment to hope that the Federal Government would accept the proposal suggested. Russia would appear to have simultaneously declined to act upon the French suggestion, because she also seems to have promised to support any endeavor which may be made by England and France.

Upon these replies the Moniteur, the official organ of the French Government, remarks that they settle the question of mediation for the present.

We have thus, in any event, a further breathing spell, during which, if we are alive to the emergency, and true to ourselves, we may do enough toward the suppression of the rebellion to secure another and a final adjournment of the mediation scheme.

For our part we have never regarded the foreign intervention bugbear with much concern, nor do we now. Diplomatic efforts to mediate will possess no more practical importance than the speeches of Mr. John Van Buren to our "wayward sister." The only thing we have ever had to fear is actual armed intervention with armies and fleets; and that, at the present time, would be at least as injurious to the nations intervening as to ourselves. Our navy is rapidly assuming proportions; both in regard to the size and the number of the vessels composing it, which will enable us to cope with the combined navies of Europe. Before any combined European military and naval expedition could be got ready and sent across the Atlantic, there is reason to believe that we shall be in possession of every port where such could effect a landing with swivie to ulterior operations. We are in a very different position now from what we were when the Trent affair took place, although European intervention would of course protract the war, and render our task more severe than it is, it would do at least as much harm to the powers which intervened as to us. If they bombarded Portland, we might bombard Liverpool. If they captured our ships, we should capture theirs. They might try to send the Warrior to the broadside to the streets of New York and Hoboken," and she might get there, or not, as the affair turned out. But we know that Farragut could do in the Thames what he did in the Mississippi, and steam up to London Bridge with a fleet of impregnable iron-clads. So of the French. They might do us a vast deal of mischief, no doubt. But if the war began, we fancy that a good many French ports would be demolished before it ended; the tide hattized La Gloire and La Normandie would have gone to their last reckoning under the 15inch shot of our Monitors; and the brave little French army in Mexico would never see la belle France again. Would the game be worth the candle in either case? We think not, and therefore we have never believed in foreign armed intervention. Both England and France know too well what war costs to rush into it without a well-defined and substantial object.

It has been a great misfortune for this country that the Emperor of the French, who is a man and naturally well disposed toward the United States, should have been represented here ever since the war began by Monsieur Mercier—a man heartily hostile to us and to our institutions, and cordially friendly to the rebels and their institutions. So little discretion has this French man possessed that he has never made the least secret of his sympathy with the rebels. He has poured into every ear to which he had access his hatred of democracy, his belief in the rebellion, and his joy at the prospect. He has been the foremost of the rebel sympathizers at Washington in deriding our recent victories, our Government, sneering at our generals, and eulogizing our enemies. Not even the hoaxes who palm us off so much a column in the London Times have been more malevolent and more barely unjust than this French embassador. Equally regardful of the safety of his head in a country and of the respect he owed to ours, as a foreign minister resident here, he has made himself prominent for two years as an upholder of slavery, a foe to freedom, and an ally of the worst enemies the French ever had. We have reason to know—what can hardly be believed—that this man's dispatches to his Government have uniformly accorded with his conversation in society. If the Emperor has received from him for information about this country, he may honestly believe that all hopes of the restoration of the Union are ended; that we are on the eve of exhaustion; that our armies will not fight; that our generals do not know how to lead them; that the South is invincible; and that our theirs is the cause of justice and right, and ours the cause of wrong and oppression. Some of these representations that we have received from Mr. Dayton. But there must still have remained a sufficient number uncorrected to create a bias in the Emperor's mind. We do not believe that the Emperor will ever pursue any policy which may have the effect of introducing into the vitality of nations on the continent the corner-stone of human slavery." But we might have enjoyed more active sympathy from our old ally, France, had an honest representation been here, at this critical time, by a man equally devoid of political wisdom and moral convictions, but possessing neither the inclination nor the motive from making his embassy a head-quarters for rebel sympathizers, nor the self-respect to withdraw from a court which he is universally and intensely hated and despised.

For us, this mediation scheme should teach us one lesson, and one only—to hasten the work of putting down the rebellion. There is not an hour to be lost. Every day wasted by Burnside, Rosecrans, Grant, M'Clernand, Banks, Porter, Farragut, and Dupont increases the danger of foreign troubles. If the winter passes without very substantial gains by the Union arms, the suffering poor of Europe, the hostile aristocrats of England, and the rebel sympathizers in France will revive the mediation scheme in the spring, perhaps in a more energetic form than it has yet assumed. The present is ours: let us use it. The future is in the hands of Fate.

THE ARBITRARY ARREST BUSINESS.

THE Secretary of War has ordered the liberation of all political prisoners arrested by him on charges of discouraging enlistments and interfering with the draft. The order would have carried much weight if Mr. Stanton had not commenced his career by denouncing arbitrary arrests, and then proceeded to arrest ten persons for every one arrested by his predecessor. And as it is, however, it meets a very decided public wish. Nothing has been more clearly proved in the course of the arrests, than the existence, under the deep-seated aversion of the people of the North to the system of arbitrary arrests inaugurated and maintained by Secretary Stanton, and every kind of aid and comfort to rebels in arms, loyal people were so overwhelmed by the dread of an utter destruction of constitutional rights, they thought of nothing but the danger, and were ready to acquiesce in any measures, however arbitrary and illegal, that the imminence of the crisis might seem to require. As the experience has proved in this, as in all other cases, that it is unsafe to trust any man or set of men with the power to override the law. Of the arrests which have been made by order of the Government within the past eighteen months a few were probably wise and useful; but the great bulk were foolish and injurious. Most of them were well and loyally meant; but many were unjustifiable, and very few of them really did good to the cause which they were intended to serve. Obscure editors and noisy talkers have been locked up, and the wrongs they have endured have given an influence to their disloyalty which it could never have otherwise acquired. Spurious patriots have been enabled to enlist popular chivalry against the Government by feigned fear of Fort Lafayette. In some cases ignorance on the part of subordinate officers of Government, in others malice have inflicted unpardonable wrongs on innocent men. On the whole, Mr. Lincoln can hardly fail to feel that his arrests have been strange and few. If rebellion would have been no better off, if no one had ever been sent to Fort Lafayette but prisoners of war.

Difficulties, hardly defined as yet, are shadowed in the future in connection with this matter of arbitrary arrests. It is not easy to perceive what may be the upshot of Mrs. Brunsmade's case, of which the enemies of the Government are standing good set. But it is well understood that Mr. Seymour, on assuming office as Governor of New York, will hasten to join issue with the Administration on this subject, and an unpleasant collision of authority may ensue. Ex-Secretary Cameron has been once arrested, and held for trial on charges of illegal imprisonment brought against him by a person whom he had sent to Fort Lafayette when Secretary of War; more recently, on his return from Russia, he passed through the city with such circumstances of mystery that it is reported he was fearful of further molestation of a like character. In civil life likely to be tolerated by well informed, it is openly hoisted that Mr. Stanton dare not come to New York, and Mr. Seward himself has been similarly threatened.

We know not how much there may be in these innuendoes and threats, nor what may be precisely the legal responsibility of the members of the Cabinet for acts committed by them under orders of the President. But there is enough in the general aspect of the matter to create grave uneasiness in the minds of those who realize how much comfort discussions of ours would impart to the enemy, and how much weakness they would involve for ourselves. What is past can not now be mended, however, and we must make the best of it. But it may be hoped that we have seen the last of the exhibitions of fatal zeal which were developed in the arbitrary arrests of the past eighteen months.

THE LOUNGER.

OVER THE SEA.

THAT nothing may be wanting to complete the alienation of European sympathy from the cause of civil order and authority in this Government, the London Times has established a Richmond correspondence, and has recently printed the first of a series of letters designed to show the devotion and gallantry of the rebels, the baseness and cowardice of the loyal citizens of this country, and the utter futility and hopelessness of the war. Except for their gold-loads and cotton-speculation, the Yankees would long since have been "whipped out of their boots" by a population infinitely inferior in number, but overwhelming in earnestness of purpose and unity of action. The army of the rebels, he writes, is made up of the blue blood of the Southern element, that of the North is but a crowd of hired foreigners, who were hurled by the Government into battle "like a flock of half-fledged sheep" upon Washington. Meanwhile perfect security, perfect repose, perfect confidence reign in Richmond and throughout the South, while desolation and ruin follow the movements of the Northern barbarians, who regret their dead only because of the longer delay in restoring the vanished Union.

The letter is written with specious skill, and it is an illustration of the greater sagacity with which European sentiment has been manipulated by the rebels. For many months the foreign representatives of this country had been in political sympathy with the rebels. They were chiefly slaveholders themselves or the apologists of slavery, or they sealed their mouths. When the rebellion declared itself openly, these men hardly hoped for its success. John O'Sullivan, late minister to Portugal, has recently published a London book justifying the rebellion. James Williams, late Minister to Turkey, a man who glories in the fact that he was born a Kentuckian, and that he always voted the ticket that promised most for the cause of disunion, and who, now that the actual struggle has come, is the true "chivalric" Southron, gathers his goods and leaves the country forever, has also taken the same area, entitled "Secession Vindicated." Mr. Stiles, former Minister to Austria, is a Colonel or General in the rebel army. Mr. Ward, Minister to China, is an open rebel. Mr. Faulkner, late Minister to France, is a Virginian leader of rebellion. These men and many others had, of course, prepared the European mind for an utterly perverted and false view of the situation.

But besides this, the rebels have taken care to operate directly upon that mind since the rebellion took the field. They have established the foreign press. They have filled Europe with public and private emissaries. In the clubs, in the salons, they have placed accomplished agents, who have faithfully done their work; so that Mr. Mill is entirely correct in saying, in the last number of the Westminster Review, in an article upon the masterly work of Motley, that what one thinks of the son of the English hatred of the American cause is to be found in the total ignorance of the facts of the case.

What have we done to counteract this enormous influence? Mr. Motley, who resided in England when the war began, published his admirable pamphlet, and in the high society to which he had access, most manfully told the truth and maintained the cause of his country and justice. But even he could not delay for a day the issue of the British proclamation of equal belligerence. In Paris the American salons were in full sympathy with the rebellion, and the position of Mr. Slidell has unquestionably entirely overborne its influence that of Mr. Dayton. Mr. Adams, in London, has been most faithful, intrepid, and able; but he was for a long time embarrassed by a secretary who was entirely false to the country, while Cavour, the great Italian minister, who saw the whole scope of the struggle, died just as it commenced.

One of the eminent hopes of the rebellion was European sympathy. It was not necessary for it to combat it as to fight in the field. Whenever and however the enemy appeared and worked, it was only to provoke and overpower sympathy. We should have established the ablest and most incessant correspondence from America. We should have had able pamphlets. We should have filled Europe with able and loyal men, fitted for the natural task of effective opinion. In a word, we should have done, but more amply, exactly what the rebels have done.

Of course, the reason of our remissness is the old reason. We did not believe that there was to be a great war. We did not anticipate the necessity of foreign sentiment. We did not understand the desperate gravity and earnestness of our condition. A dissolution of the Union seemed to us little less than a renunciation of religion. It might be threatened, but it was impossible. The attempt, even if made, must be abortive. Why should we resist a shadowy danger, and by the very gravity of our preparations create a conviction of actual peril? The Secretary of State wrote masterly dispatches to our ministers, which they read to foreign Governments. They were necessarily powerless to affect public opinion, for they were not published until that opinion was already settling in the wrong direction.

Henceforth our duty is simple enough. Vigor and success are the field; a matter, not solely in the whole management of the war: these, and these only, will subdue the rebellion and frustrate the consequences of European hostility.

DISCIPLINE.

THE rebels claim, but without some show of reason, that they fight for liberty, and that the strictest military discipline in their army is an evidence of their superior earnestness. They argue that no people accustomed to the habits of liberty would submit to the necessary restraints and hardships of military life except from the most profound and vital conviction of the importance of their cause. This rebel deserters have been shot. Rebel stragglers from the ranks are disgraced and publicly branded. The rebels are willing, in making war, to make it according to the rules of war.

The want of discipline in our army is felt not only in the army, but in public sentiment. The national mind seems to be hardly persuaded of the cardinal truth that the way of peace is first subjugation and then reconstruction. There is no use in conducting military operations with pleasure. The great mass of the rebels have of late years always held the people whom they called "cadaver." The experience of every observing man is conclusive upon this point. They have not indeed insulted every Northern traveler. But they have been inspired and somewhat feared the mass of Northerners as peddlers and tinkers; and they have cordially hated the Northern gentleman as the very spirit of Northern civilization. This feeling, which may be denied, but which is known to perhaps the big hit multitude of thoughtful observers in the country, has been exasperated to the last degree by the war. The rebels, therefore, when there was opportunity upon our part, there will be no possibility of the restoration of any relations whatever. They would except after they are subdued by force of arms—that is to say, until they are coerced, conquered, subjugated.

If we are not willing to see that and to say it, then we are not willing to do our work. Our military discipline is the discipline of the national mind by and to that conviction. Let us once thoroughly understand that we are at war entirely with deserters because we do not fully appreciate the deadly earnestness of the war, and either the commander-in-chief or once general or we shall patiently submit to disgrace and ruin.

TO MY NEIGHBOR ACROSS THE PASSAGE.

MY DEAR NEIGHBOR,—You and I were in the same corridor at the hotel last night, and it is a very narrow corridor and very quiet. You came in late, just after twelve. You saw by the knots at the doors of the neighboring rooms, and by the dark windows over them, that the inmates had gone to sleep. Why did you bang your door until the house shook? Why did you slam your boots upon the floor as if you were trying to drive a hole through it? Why not learn how to shut a door with a soft and pleasant sound softly? Why should you wake up those to whom sleep may be peculiarly necessary by a perfectly unnecessary noise? Have you ever asked yourself how an ill-bred man would behave if he were going to bed at such an hour and in such a place? Have you ever reflected that a man is honorably upon his good behavior always? Would it not suit you just as well to close your door instead of banging it, and to lay your boots quietly at your door instead of dashing them down?

It is at least worth thinking of. Believe me, it is much little conduct that kills smooth and easy. Have you ever observed that if a man does a purely generous and courteous action, and departs from that grand beauty of conduct, "Let not your eye fix himself and the de'il for the hindmost," he has often a half-ashamed air, as if he were "creest or had been taken in? What a pitiful comment it is upon our daily intercourse! You and I are strangers. I see you, you see me; nor shall we ever know that the other was his neighbor last night. But I am addressing the lodger in the opposite room. I think it was No. 8. If you are he, this letter is meant for you. If you are he, let us urge you not to make yourself a nuisance in every hotel neighborhood into which you may venture. It is easy to be courteous in manners if your soul is courteous. I shall believe that yours is so, but that you have unconsciously formed a bad habit. Conquer it. Respect your neighbors in the hotel. Don't scold and swear like a northeaster. Don't bang your door. Don't slam your boots. Don't steal the sheep for which your neighbors have paid, but be the gentleman you wish to be. Good-morning, neighbor.

Your faithful friend,

THE LOUNGER.

ENGLISH HATE.

THE young gentlemen at Cambridge University in England have been lately debating in their club the question whether the cause of the North or of is not the cause of Human Progress. One hundred and seventeen young gentlemen, including the present son of Lord Russell, voted against thirty-three that it was not.

If each young people of Scotland should secede from the union with England in order to open the slave-trade and extend the blessed benefit of slave labor, it would be the cause of human progress, and budding young British statesmen would decide by heavy votes in their Debating Club that the British Government was tyrannical and the foe of human welfare in resisting the effort. Or if not, why not?

Of course the Cambridge Debating Club has already declared that the cause of the South in fighting against Great Britain was that of human progress. Or if not, why not?

Naturally the legislators of Cambridge saw in the revolt of the Sepoys a vindication of the rights of human nature against tyranny. Or if not, why not?

When Mr. Ragin helps himself to his neighbor's handkerchief in the Strand and takes it home to his illustrates the great cause of human progress. And policeman X, who pursues him, is an overbearing bully trying to show his gentlemanly spirit by knocking over the gallant and chivalric Ragin. So votes the Cambridge conclave of young English gentlemen. Or if not, why not?

The enforcement of laws made by common consent is human progress, and wicked despotism.

The use of constitutional powers by the President makes him rather worse than Bombas of Naples:

Stealing forts and arms, robbing the treasury, and firing upon the flag of your country are not your fellow-citizens defending it, and all confessedly for no other purpose than to secure immunity in stealing other property, and making them work for low wages and raise children for somebody else to sell, are the acts of a heroic people, of a race of gentlemen, of natural lords of the soil.

These are some of the excellent doctrines affirmed by the Debating Society of young gentlemen at Cambridge, England. At Oxford they cheer for that great and good man, Jefferson Davis. The other benefactors and heroes, Jonathan Wild, William Kidd, Benedict Arnold, and Richard Turpin, are either in the gallery of English literature, the shades, or in Madame Tussaud's Exhibition, we forget which. Mr. and Mrs. Manning are also there.

Hatred of the United States is an epidemic that rages with frightful violence all over England. The nation is demented. It foams at the word Union. It laughs at Liberty. It cheers a man whose only distinction is that he tried to destroy the best of governments for the basest of purposes. It extols a rebellion which has no military excuse to urge for its atrocities. And the hatred is deep. It is utterly impotent. England—always excepting the truly generous and noble names that we all know by heart—glares at us in a rage it can not gratify, hoping that the ruin it can not inflict may overwhelm us. We feed its spindles and its people. If we absolutely stopped that supply the grain England would wail and die. She is livid with jealousy. The rot has struck even to her heart, and young Englishmen, babbling a lesson they have heard and do not understand, cheerfully vote that the cause of human slavery is the cause of human progress.

If a more ludicrous and pitiable spectacle was ever seen at Cambridge University it is not recorded. Oxford refused to make Mr. Edward Everett an LL.D., because he had been a Unitarian clergyman. But that was merely the dull, reputation bigotry of a British Institution. Hatred is disloyalty to man, and to the great cause whose defense is the sole glory of England hitherto—the cause of civil liberty under law.

A GREEK REVOLUTION.

THE King of Greece has retired from business, but not by his own choice. He and his Queen left Athens for a short tour in the country. Some of the provinces rose in revolt, not standing, but abominably protesting against his Government. The people of Athens immediately began to move. The peasants of Attica crowded into the city. The soldiers were put on guard at the palace, in which a poor old deanna, or royal housekeeper, Madame Palsky, had been left in charge. The people appeared before it, and the soldiers joined them. Poor old Madame Palsky was taken to the house of the British Minister. The King and Queen arrived in a steamer at the Piræus, the port of Athens, but did not land; and his royal Majesty, at that safe distance, heroically declared that he would not resign his crown—unless all the people wanted him to do so. All the people did want it, and King Otho, all civility, sailed away from his kingdom. The revolution was accomplished, and not a life was lost.

A Provisional Government was formed, supported by the army and the people, for in Greece, as elsewhere, they are usually separate powers. The formation of this Government was probably the act of a clique of leaders, although the fact does not appear. In such a movement the names of well-known citizens were doubtless suggested to the crowd as fit members of a Government, and readily ratified by the popular assent. The members immediately published an address, in which they say that they maintain the constitutional monarchical government—that Greece is eternally grateful to the three Great Powers of Europe—that they will enforce the laws and convoke the National Assembly. A more peaceful revolution was never wrought.

The next step is the agreement of the three dry-nurses of Greece upon a king. Otho was a son of King Louis of Bavaria, like Maximilian's Louis. There is some talk of offering the crown to an English Prince; but Russia would hardly care to see Greece erected into a British dependency. It is easy to begin a revolution, but not so easy to make it do exactly what you wish. You may guide the stream to your mill, but whether it will run smoothly in your race and turn the wheel for your grist, or sweep wheel and race and mill itself to destruction, is a profoundly interesting inquiry.

But what a commentary upon modern monarchical systems! What king seated by a revolution in our time feels secure in his seat? Enthroned by a popular tumult, he is always accountable to it. He may escape the reckoning either by governing well or by offering sagacious excuse by an army. But since the popular will is the real source of his power, the part of wisdom is to regulate the expression of that will by a fundamental law. A king by popular election is conceivable. But a monarchy—or chance hereditary succession of kings—by popular consent, is gradually becoming impossible.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE landlord of a hotel at Brighton entered in angry mood the chamber occupied by two gentlemen. "Now, Sir, I want you to pay your bill, and you must. I have asked you often enough, and I will be paid. Do you leave my house till you pay it?" "Good," said the lodger, "I'll stay with you as long as I live."

"Adelaide, you must spend your money more prudently hereafter, beautiful, when you are grown up, you will have need of it." "Perhaps I shall, but if I should die young, as a great many do, I should like the good of the money. I think I had much better spend it now, and make use of it."

WHAT THE WIDOW'S CLUB.—Charles Dunlester, the interlocutor punster, going into a coffee-room one stormy night, said, "I never saw such a wet night in my life." "Saw a wind!" says a friend. "I never heard of such a thing as saying a wind, you may what is it like?" "Like!" answered Charley, "like to have blown my head off."

Why is a dinner like spring?—Because a single swallow never makes it.

SIGNALLING PARODY.—Every one has admired Partheniu's definition of love in lingoese:

"What love is, if thou wouldst be taught,
Thy heart must teach alone—
Two souls with but a single thought,
Two hearts that beat as one."

Some prefer a rebus, having no fear of Cupid before his eyes, perpetrate the following villainous parody:

"Love is a nightmare with one foot;
Two children with one bun;
Two lovers with a single coat;
Two cabbage-heads as one."

A man of quality who had a very little nose jibed a settler whose nose was very large. "My boy!" said the soldier, "why are you so angry at my nose? Do you think I was made at the tail-end of yours?"

"Mr. Smith," said a little fellow, the other evening, to his sister's beau, "I wish you wouldn't praise our Ann Elizabeth, and say she's pretty. She's made me so proud that she won't speak to cousin Laura, nor help mother the least bit."

Mrs. Partington, hearing that a young man had set up for himself, "Poor fellow!" she said, "he has no friend that will set up on him, and he'll be ruined." And she sighed to be young again.

General Boerstler, right arm was shattered by a bill during the battle between the two amputated above the elbow. While lying in a hospital tent he met General Kearney, who had lost his left arm in Mexico. "I want to make a bargain with you, General," said Howard, "that hereafter we buy our gloves together."

It is a bad sign to see a man with his hat off at midnight explaining the theory and principles of true politeness to his shoes.

"Man," says Adam Smith, "is an animal that makes bargains." Never mind about him—do fog exchanges know with another."

Many persons seem to be of Franklin's opinion, "that time is money" they take so much of it to pay their debts.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

On November 21 General Sumner, commanding the Right Grand Division of the Army of the Potomac, temporarily assumed the command of Fredericksburg. The city had was conveyed by General Particle to the Mayor and council of the city during a day of truce. General Sumner's communication complained that the troops under his command had been fired upon from the city, that the inhabitants and factories there are employed in the rebel service, and that the troops from the city were forwarding provisions to the rebel army. He declared that this must terminate, demanded the surrender of the city, and gave notice that unless fire ceased by 6 P.M. on Saturday—for women and children and the sick to be removed. The civic authorities, in their interview with General Patrick, offered to remedy the evil, as far as ruling upon our troops and forbidding supplies to the rebel army could remedy; but they refused to surrender the city, and complained of the short time allowed to remove the sick and the women and children.

During the interview with the civic authorities, General Sumner informed them that if they had any further communication to present, General Patrick would meet them again the next morning. On 25th, accordingly, the Mayor and Council came over, accompanied by Judge Taylor, Thos. Colvert, Bland, and Captain Kline, of Loyalty. The latter claimed that his rebel organization had broken up proposition, unless the oath was approved by them. Gen. Patrick refused to accept the oath. Some officers, subsequently, have informed Burnside assented to their request, and the parties returned. The civil authorities asked for an extension of the time allowed for the removal of the women and children, alleging that the trains had been destroyed by the rebel cavalry, and that it would be impossible for a train to leave before night. The city being absolutely destitute of other means of transportation their request was complied with, and the time extended until eleven o'clock A. M. on 26th (Sunday). No attack was made on Sunday or Monday.

M'CLERNAND'S EXPEDITION.

General M'Clernand's expedition down the Mississippi River is now being organized at Columbus, Kentucky. It is designed to open the white river, the New Orleans, and will consist of a force of 40,000. The gunboats are under the Commodore Porter will co-operate in the movement. The fleet consists of seven gun-boats, carrying 121 guns. The troops will be sent to the most important point of attack; but this work is done, and Admiral Farragut, with his fleet of gun-boats below that city to co-operate with Porter and M'Clernand, the defenses at Vicksburg will not present any very formidable obstacles.

THE BANKS' EXPEDITION.

In the Banks' expedition New York will certainly have five regiments, Connecticut five regiments, Maine three regiments, and Massachusetts eight regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and three batteries of artillery.

SKIRMISH NEAR SUFFOLK.

Our pickets were driven in at Suffolk on 19th, but General York immediately sent out a force which drove all the rebels clear over the Blackwater River. The bridges across the river and the adjoining creek were being rapidly constructed by our troops. At latest accounts every thing was quiet in that District.

M'CLELLAN'S STAFF.

The two officers of General M'Clellan's staff who had been recently arrested and sent to Washington—Lieutenant-Colonel Key and Captain Duane—have been released from an arrest, which appears to have been merely technical, and are now on their way back to the army. The latter is General Brannan, in South Carolina, and the former, Colonel Clifford, will take charge of an important bureau in the Adjutant-General's office.

COST AND STATE OF OUR ARMY.

The estimate for the expense of our army for the coming year are set down at four hundred and twenty-eight millions of dollars. The appropriations for the Quarter's Department still unpaid amount to forty-eight millions. Besides the 75,000 men in the Adjutant-General's office, the number of soldiers on the sick list at this moment amounts to seventy-two thousand, and the number of men in the United States—namely, one hundred and six thousand men.

RELEASE OF POLITICAL PRISONERS.

An important order was issued by the War Department on 25th, which releases from custody all those now held as political prisoners, discontinuing arbitrary arresting this day, etc. This order will empty Fort Lafayette and Fort Warren, and many military prisons of many of their inmates.

CHANGE IN THE REBEL CABINET.

A change has taken place in the rebel Cabinet. General Randolph has been removed from, or has resigned, the office of Secretary of War, and James A. Seddon, of Virginia, appointed in his place.

SURVEY OF LANDS IN LOUISIANA.

A series of orders have recently been issued by General Butler, which provide for additional land that on which can arise in his Department which he is not able to grasp. The property of rebels confiscated by the operations of the forces under General Weitzel, to be known as the Lafourche District. The declared unpunishable by the laws of transfers if is not forbidden. The District comprises all the Territory of Louisiana lying west of the Mississippi, excepting the parishes of Plaquemine and Jefferson. A Commissioner is appointed to take charge of the district, and the sugar plantations are to be worked by them where they can be found. Any person of color, male and negro or white labor may be employed at discretion. All property belonging to persons in the rebel service, forfeited and sold for the benefit of the Government, under the provisions of the Confiscation Act, or by other competent authority, and other manufactories of sugar, molasses, or other products of the soil, and agricultural districts containing figures by any person in such place will be recommended to the President for dismissal from the service. Persons are recommended to be appointed known as the National Advocate for an improper publication. He will endeavor to publish the secrets of any one to the person arresting knows that such slave is owned by a citizen of the United States residing in the loyal portion of the State, has also issued two important orders. One directs a draft to be made on members of Company A of First and Second Congressional Districts of the State. The election is appointed for the 1st December, and that for the exercise in the Thirty-seventh Congress. The other exempts from military service all persons employed in the Mint.

A SOUTHERN PROTEST AGAINST INTERVENTION.

General Pemberton, the successor of General Van Dorn in the command of the rebel forces in Mississippi, has made a speech at meeting convened in Jackson, in which he says that if the United States intervene by Europe, we are no longer a nation, but a province guarded. (Great applause.) We must settle the question ourselves, or fail entirely. We must remain England knows, she will not be at a united people, and she will have to meet with the wonder of the North as well as that of the South. Any cries of "Yes, yes, yes!" from every quarter. "No intervention!" he said, "I will settle it between you." "I want to see you thus united on this question; and with a reliance on ourselves, and a firm trust in the God of battles, a few days your General will again fling your banners to the breeze of the South." Farewell to rebellion's vassal dancers we have suffered in this Department.

THE WAR ONWARD.

Cotton is now coming into Memphis freely, and in large quantities, from points along the river. Several boats have arrived from Helena, Arkansas, and Cortello. The steamer Platte Valley brought up a load of cotton, largest single load of cotton that has yet come, which is the largest single load. She was fired into by bushwhackers out of the rebel lines. She was shot all could carry at the present stage of water, and she was accompanied by a large amount on the Memphis levee, awaiting shipment. The impression prevails at Memphis that cotton will come in as fast as rapidly as steamers can be found to bring it away. Wait Thompson is now down from Helena from the number of the rebels and guerrilla bands. The last vestige of the latter are now said to be driven in confusion from the Yazoo country. Fort Henry, a few days ago, by General Hannon.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE PROPOSED MEDIATION SCHEME.

The London Gazette publishes the following official report, dated November 13:

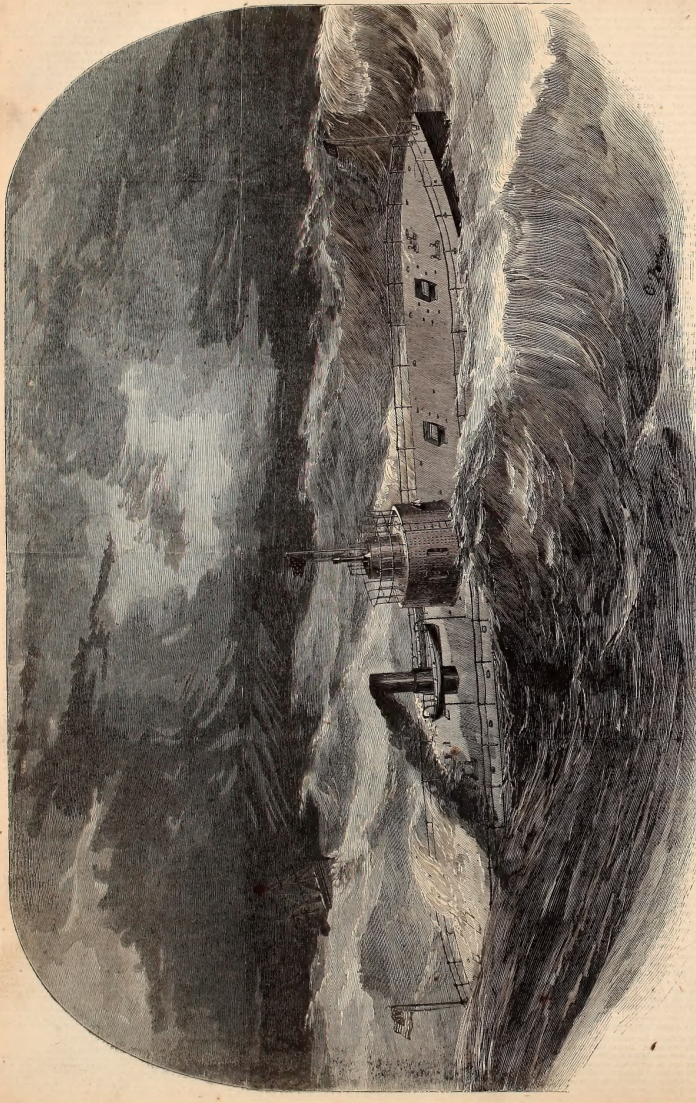
It resulted from the circular of Drouyn de l'Huys proposing mediation. It recognizes the humane views and disinterested sentiments of the Emperor, and observes that the concurrence of Russia would be expressly desirable; but that up to the present time the Russian Government had not agreed to actively co-operate, although it may support the intervention of France. Under the circumstances consideration was, therefore, the end proposed of a similar step on the part of England.

Earl Russell then commends the letter of her Majesty's Government as follows:

After weighing all information received from American, the Government is led to conclude that there is no ground at the present moment to expect that the Federal Government would accept the proposal suggested, and a refusal from Washington at the present time would prevent any speedy renewal of the offer of the Government; therefore it thinks it better to watch carefully the course of events in America, and if—as there appears reason to hope—it may be found that circumstances are favorable to such a change, the Government may then avail themselves of such steps as may seem their friendly offices with a more prospect than now exists of its being accepted by the contending parties.

Her Majesty's Government will communicate to the French Government any intelligence they may receive from Washington or Richmond bearing on this important subject.

FRANCE.



THE IMPERIAL POLICY.

M. DE PERSIGNY, in a circular to the French prefects, declares that M. THOUVENEL dismissed, not M. DROUYN DE L'HUYS' appointment to the office of Minister of Foreign Affairs, implies no change in Napoleon's foreign policy. The Emperor has always intended "neither to sacrifice the Pope to Italy, nor Italy to the Pope."

GRANDTHER BALDWIN.

A THANKSGIVING BALLAD.

UNDERNEATH protecting branches, from the highway just aloof,
Stands the house of Grandther Baldwin, with its goatly-singing roof.

Square of shape and solid-timbered, it was standing, I have heard,
In the days of Philip and Tory, under royal George the Third.

Many a time, I well remember, I have gazed with childish awe
At the knife-marks remaining in the sturdy oaken door,

Turning round half-apprehensive (reeking not how Time had fled)
Of the lurking savage foeman from whose musket it was sped.

Not far off the barn, forsooth! with the Autumn's hair-spoil ripe,
Holds the farmer's well-earned trophies—the increase of the fruitful year.

Filled the lofts with hay, sweet-scented, ravished from the meadow grass,
While beneath are stalled the cattle, with their quiet, gentle lowing.

Deep and spacious are the grain-bins, brimming o'er with Nature's gold;
Here are piles of yellow pumpkins on the barn floor loosely rolled.

Just below, in cosy recesses, safe from wintry frost and chill,
There are heaps of ruddy apples from the orchard on the hill.

Many a year has Grandther Baldwin in the old house dwelt in peace,
As his hair each year grew whiter he has seen his hearth-stone increase.

Sturdy sons and comely daughters growing up from childish years,
One by one have met life's duties, and gone forth their several spheres.

Hushed the voice of childish laughter, hushed is childish sport and sigh,
Curling wreaths of smoke mount upward to the grey November sky.

Softly lads and lasses dance, just let loose from school-dom's cares,
Patter, pitter, bare and clatter up and down the great hall stairs.

All the busy maid bid high revel, all the girls and boys have their way—
That's the lot of Grandther Baldwin's upon each Thanksgiving Day.

From the parlor's sacred precincts, hark! a maiden up the stairs
Rouses Charlie's playing stage-coach, and the stage-coach rouses Claire,

Jos, black-eyed and laughter-loving, Grandther's speed-wax how to throw,
Wrestle with a brother lively, who is gayly playing now,

Grandma's face is fairly radiant, Grandther knows and how to frown,
Though she's in the kitchen busy, and he's in the room upside down.

For he says he had high revel, and the girls must have their way;
That's the lot of Grandther Baldwin's upon each Thanksgiving Day.

But the dinner—ah! the dinner—words are feeble to portray
What a culinary triumph is achieved Thanksgiving Day.

Forty grouse the hand of cookery, with dainties, but the turkey rules the roast,
Aldermanic in the station—at the last a fearless ghost.

Then the richness of the pudding, and the flavor of the pies!
When you've dined at Grandma Baldwin's you will know as well as I.

When at length the feast was ended Grandther Baldwin bowed his head,
And amid the silence solemn he returned voice he said:

"Now unto God, the Gracious One, we thanks and hom. We sup joy,
Who grandeth us, and guideth us, and loveth us alway:

"He maketh bright the sunshine, He giveth us increase,
He crowns us with his kindnesses, and granteth us His peace.

"Join Himself our wandering feet we pray that He may direct,
And may we strive with faithful hearts to keep His holy law.

His simple words in silence died—a moment's hush and then
From all the listening hearts there rose a solemn-voiced Amen!

THE BLEEDING DIAMOND.

IT was in the early part of the eighteenth century that the Duchy of Schweinfelden-Sandbach, a territory situated to the northeastward of the territory of Weissenhorn, had for its Sovereign Ludwig Adolf the Seventy-fourth, surnamed the Terrible. He was an awful tyrant. The total number of his subjects amounted to about two thousand, all of whom, from the baby in arms to the alms-old woman of eighty, groaned under the alms-house door, hated him with intense cordiality. His family detested him with remarkable unanimity. His father-in-law, Prince Lulu of Lulu, was driven into banishment many years before. Opie Jones was invited as to whether his ex-wife due to his having knocked down his father-in-law on his mother, or to his papa having been detected in sprinkling some pretty white powder which glittered very much over the Spartan ration of sauerkraut, which formed the prince's daily and solitary meal. At all events, he had been comfortably tried for high treason in his absence, and executed in effigy; while, by a general vigilant all contingencies, the whipping-post in the market-place of Schweinhausen was garnished with a permanent announcement from the grand-ducal and paternal pen, offering a reward of one hundred florins to whomsoever should capture the condemned traitor, Ludwig von Porkstein (the hereditary name of the princes of Schweinhundhausen), dead or alive. Friedrich Adolf, the second son, and usually known as Arme Fritz, or poor Fred, had merely been turned out of doors at the age of sixteen, and was supposed to be serving as a sergeant in the armies of the Kaiser. Dorothea Adolfina, the eldest daughter, endured humanity by constantly quarreling, had run away with Count Putz von Putzenburg, the penniless younger son of a sovereign count, and had been forgiven on her return to the bosom of the house of Porkstein. Ludwig Adolf the Seventy-fourth had the fugitives and disobedient princess duly turned in the court chapel by Amschel-Jeroboam Dr. Bonastus, and, having added his paternal malison thereto, cut her picture out of the family pen-knife, and forbidden her name to be mentioned, under penalty of the pillory and the spinning-house, by any grand-ducal public functionary or table. Of his large family, then, there only remained to the Schweinfelden-Sandbachian court the young princesses, who were fed on sauer-kraut, kept in continual terror, and whipped every Monday morning by the governess, whether they had deserved it or not; and a very small young prince, named Carl Adolphus, whom, somehow, he cried less than anybody to ill-treat, for the boy was a fool (he's yes; and it was only a week before his last, that the grand-duchess (who acted as a duenna of little Carl) had looked with those same eyes (after a horrible scene in the dining-room of the Residenz) upon Ludwig the Seventy-fourth, and gasped out, "You are my gaoler!"

But Ludwig Adolf was a prince to be liked, and nearly every thing he had a liking to was bad. Whenever he put on his yellow stockings striped with red, it was a sign that he meant mischief; and he put them on at least three times a week. In his grand court-suit of yellow velvet, with the yellow stockings to match, he looked the personification of the Grand-Ducal Order—pray observe the color over the Inn and Whistle, and the corresponding periwig surmounting his swollen and violet-stained countenance, he indeed merited his sobriquet of the Terrible. He looked like a gigantic orange-peel with a Bengal tiger. He had an army of a hundred and fifty men, all clothed in fleming yellow striped with black. He beat them successfully, but was sometimes capriciously generous, and entrusted with them until awhile from the Imperial Marshal of the Residenz. He was very fond of gambling: but was to be the wretch who won money of this Sovereign. He was grim of countenance, but he had no mercy upon the soldier whose eyes were influenced, or whose gait was unsteady after supper. To the halberds, the picket, or the black hole with him at once! He had invented a cat with thirteen tails for the special torture of those soldiers in the case was his famous instrument of correction. He caned his hockeys; he caned his children (always excepting Carl Adolphus); he caned himself. He had his knee knocking together, presented his mid-day basket of fruit with a bow to him. In a word, he was, at the palace gate, who always had the palsy when he presented arms to Ludwig the Terrible. He would walk in the mornings in the park, with his caned aid-de-camp carrying horror and confusion in his train, and the bewildered citizens, as he struck his thick children under the bed when his saffron-colored requisitor was seen at the end of the street; the knock knocked themselves in their own rooms; the baker felt his own become icy; the blacksmith shivered at his forge. He would kick over the old women's spinning-wheels, and break the stalls at the street-corners. He would burst into the tavern, demolish the mensuration of beer, and cause all the beer to be flung into the gutter. He would invade the tribunals, thrust the Staats Procurator from his seat, bully the Assessor, and reverse the sentences, always on the side of severity. He would inspect guns, accompanied by the shaking of the heart into the shoes, and a quivering of the lip took place when he entered the schools and bade the Master point out to him the most idle and behaved boy. Then he would go home to the Residenz and dine in spiced and fiery meats, oftentimes flinging the plates and dishes at his head. His body servants, or kicking his secretary and chamberlain's shins under the table. He would then, after drank like a hippopotamus, bellowed like a bull, swore like a trooper, and then, until it was time to have a supper, lit out the smoking-room, and stirred like a pig. In short, Ludwig Adolf the Seventy-fourth was an absolute monarch, and there were a great many monarchs as trumpery and as tyrannical as he on these charming Rhine banks in the early part of the eighteenth century.

When the far-seeing British Parliament resolved upon calling in Illustrious Prince, and Hessian, and when, on the death of Queen Anne, the illustrious Elector of Hanover was proclaimed George the First of England, mighty dreams of ambition began to course through the heated brain of Grand-Duke Ludwig, who was in correspondence with the Elector King. He had drank deep, and had dreamed deeper still with him. Secretly he said all kinds of flattering things to him; why not, through that august influence, now powerful in Germany, obtain for himself a vote in the Diet as an electorate, for a kingdom; or rather, why should he not, aspiring to aggrandizement, blend the expense of his neighbors—Putzenburg, and Weissenhehne, and Rannnichtsgen?

"It would be a fine thing," said Adolf, twisting his red mustaches—I forgot to tell you that a pair of these were, out of red swabbish, and one of red mustaches, flamed beneath the white periwig—"I have said it; I must send my brother of England the Grand Cross of my order of the Pig and Whistle!"

"Indeed a sagacious, generous, and truly grandducal thought," murmured Mr. High Chamberlain Rappfoogel.

"Perhaps Adolf could swallow any amount of flattery, yet he frowned at this compliment from the chamberlain. "Grand-ducal, grand-ducal," he grumbled between his teeth; "why not kingly, warum nicht, ah Grand-Duke of Donkeys?"

Dr. Oker-Hof-Prediger Bonastus, who sat on the other side, and who really liked his pipe, was a better courtier. In a discreet under-tone he characterized his sovereign's ideas as "truly imperial." He would have been safe for a bishopric had there been any episcopate in Schweinhundhausen.

Ludwig Adolf was appeased. "Yes," he continued, "I shall send my master of the ceremonies and introducer of embassadors"—(no diplomatists were ever accredited to the grand-duchy, but that did not let the functionaries have "Von Schaffenhal" ben, to London, with the gift to my brother Königs George. But that you, oh chamberlain, are an incorrigible ass and dunderhead I would confide from the station to you."

Mr. High Chamberlain bowed. "Your Mansuetude," he ventured to remark, "will doubtless send the much-prized decoration in gold?"

"In gold!" cried Ludwig the Terrible. "Cow, idiot, blockhead! Thinkest thou I am a cobbler, a tinker? I shall send it in brilliants. The centre shall be composed of the great Schweinhundhausen diamond, the Reish Diamond. Let Abimelech Ben Azi, the Court Jew, be sent for; to present himself here the first thing on the morrow morning, or it will be the worse for him."

At the mention of the great Schweinfelsich diamond there was a buzz of amazement mingled with terror among the courtiers. The poor grandduchess, deceased, had brought this celebrated gem as part of her wedding-portion. She had been a princess of Schweinfelsich-Bonastus, hence the name of the jewel, which was supposed to be the largest diamond in Europe (save in Germany, but (as the Schweinhundhauseners fondly believed) in all Europe. The surprise, therefore, of the court when they heard that the Grand-Duke had been was to be sent as a present to a foreign sovereign may be easily imagined. Their terror may be accounted for when it is remembered that the great Schweinfelsich diamond had ever been held as a jewel of Crown, inseparable from the throne upon all who were in any way concerned with it.

Although Schweinhundhausen was a very small army, it had looked like a splendid European outfit at that epoch, its Jews' Street, or Judengasse. There dwelt the few Israelites who contrived to shuffle through existence without being shinned alive by the exactions of Ludwig Adolf; and in the smallest, dirtiest house in the whole Judengasse lived certainly, next to the grand-duke, the richest man in Schweinhundhausen, Abimelech Ben Azi. He was a dealer in watches, money, china, tea, and coffee, snuff-boxes—any thing you please; but he was also a most expert and accomplished goldsmith and jeweller, by virtue of the last-named qualifications had been promoted to the rank of Court Jew. Ludwig Adolf owed him the whole, very gracious to Abimelech Ben Azi, condescending to borrow a few thousand florins from him at certain intervals, but never to time—not because he wanted the money, but in order to let the Court Jew have the use of it, was, in his normal condition, a person to be squeezed.

On the morrow morning Abimelech, having been admitted to the presence of his grace, made his appearance, not without fear and trembling, at the residence; for if there be one thing more disgraceful than the favor shown by a sovereign to usurach, it is having to call upon him. He was received by Ludwig Adolf standing, as he was in the habit of borrowing his quarter's salary in advance—and Ludwig Adolf always kept his courtiers standing—and he was not made it high reasons to ask for cash—from the Court Jew, was probably cold in the fact, for the time he was ushered into the presence, and made the numerous and lowly obeisances required by Schweinhundhausen etiquette. As soon, however, pervaded the imperial marrow of Abimelech Ben Azi when he saw peeping from beneath the dressing-gown of His Mansuetude a pair of soiled taffeta embroidered with crimson) those direly renowned yellow stockings which, whenever donned, were assumed to mean mischief.

For a wonder, however, the terrible potentate seemed in a placable mood. The Court Jew's niece was playing at his feet, quite unmoved by the awful vibrations which went over and over Ludwig Adolf would bestow a grin of affection on his youngest born, which would have been positively frightful if it had not already reminded the spectator of a hyena over some especially toothsome morsel of a white-bone of lamb.

"Mr. Court Jew," said His Mansuetude, "what is the course of exchange?"

Abimelech Ben Azi began to falter out something about thalers, florins, and marks bance, making up his mind that he had been bidden to the presence for the purpose of being squeezed, when Ludwig Adolf stayed him with a gracious movement of his hand. "I say gracious, because this prince seldom lifted his hand save to throw something or to hit somebody.

"Mr. Court Jew," he continued, "I have a task for you to perform. That, if you fail in performing to my satisfaction, the skin will be removed from the nape of your neck to the sole of your foot, is, I flatter myself, a sufficient guarantee for your zeal and fidelity. You are to know, moreover, that not the great Schweinfelsich diamond forthwith as a centre to the Grand Cross of the Order of the Pig and Whistle."

To hear, in all matters of business with Ludwig the Terrible, was to obey. Abimelech Ben Azi took away the great diamond with him, not without some remonstrances from little Prince Carl, who wanted to play with it; and hiding the precious bauble beneath the lapel of his gaberdine, returned to his house in the Judengasse. He had been instructed to spare no expense as to the gold for setting, and some minor gems to encircle the great diamond, so as to make it truly resplendent gift. When he reached home it was dinner-time, and his wife and seven children forthwith abandoned their mess of millet and oil, and swarmed round him to gape upon the wondrous gleam of the great Schweinfelsich diamond. Jochabad Sara, his long journeyman, saw the diamond too, and grinned an evil grin.

Jochabad Spas had served his apprenticeship at Swedzabad, the capital of the principality of Mangel-Wurzelstein. Father or mother he had none. He had an unlovely manner, a cruel eye, and an evil grin; but he was a capital workman, and the right-hand man of Abimelech Ben Azi.

"What a pity that such a beautiful diamond should be cut to be leaf-eating Prussians!" said the long journeyman.

"Ah! 'tis a pity indeed," said the Court Jew.

"Not only a pity, but a cruel shame!" exclaimed Esther, his wife; an opinion re-echoed by the seven children, who had all loved diamonds from their youth upward.

"Ah! 'tis cruel," resumed Jochabad, "that even while here it should lie hidden in the treasury of a cruel old tyrant, instead of making the fortune of some honest merchant."

"Hush, hush!" cried Abimelech; "you are talking treason, main lieber." But still he lent a greedy ear to the long journeyman's words.

"The stone is worth two hundred thousand dollars," remarked Jochabad.

"So much?"

"And diamonds, the bigger the better, are so easy to smuggle in these times when the real secret has been revealed. Did I not learn it from old Father Schick before I came hither, three years since?"

"Ach! Himmel!" cried the Court Jew, "I forgot! You want to steal the great Schweinfelsich Spas?" But he listened to the tall tempter nevertheless.

He stood and listened until the two agreed together to commit a great crime. The secret of counterfeiting diamonds by means of a fine vitrification of the stone was, indeed, it is questionable whether ever artisan attained so great a profession as this sophisticator of gems. Jochabad Spas, the pupil of Father Schick. So well did Spas consummate his fraud that, when he showed the jewel, as ordered to his master, the Court Jew was himself for a moment deceived, and thought that Spas was going on the veritable gem. The Schweinfelsich diamond was placed in an iron casket and carefully concealed under the flooring of the workshop, the two rogues agreeing to wait until Ludwig Adolf Servitor died (as he was assassinated, or until they could slip away from his dominions and sell the jewel in some one of the great European capitals.

In due time the jewel was set in the Pig and Whistle, with a blazing imposture, glistening with all the colors of the rainbow in its centre, was completed, and taken to Abimelech Ben Azi, without certain inward misgivings, to the Residenz. But Ludwig Adolf suspected no foul play. It did not enter into his nervous organization that any mortal would dare to play any tricks with him. He was, on the contrary, delighted with the decoration, and was pleased to say that he never thought the great Schweinfelsich diamond could have been set so well. Thereupon he was the Court Jew in high favor, and was even given to understand by the Judengasse generally that for twenty thousand florins, an old tumble-down house in the Hard-Scrich-Platz, of which the grandduke happened to be proprietor.

On the twenty-fourth of August, 17—, Introduction of the embassador and master of the ceremonies Schaffundschaffen was dispatched on his mission. He was graciously permitted to pay his own travelling expenses, but was given the second class of the Pig and Whistle at his return. As this setting of the jewels has had a curious habit of not coming back when they once get near of the grand-ducal dominions, Ludwig Adolf took the precaution, by the accidental hands of Father Schick, Grandduke's estates under temporary sequestration, and furthermore to lock up his daughter Dorothea Adolfina in the community of Lutheran canonesses. However, impelled by loyalty and fidelity, conducted, perhaps, by that ineffaterial guarantees, the Introducer of embassadors made his bow again at the Residenz within four months of his departure. Such was the warmest and most grateful acknowledgments from Ludwig George the First of England, contained in a letter couched in very bad French, and transmitted by "Monsieur mon cousin," and was, besides, the bearer of two splendid Arabian horses. During a assortment of choice china monsters, a chest of tea, and a dozen of York hams, as a present from the Majesty of England to the Mansuetude of Schweinhundhausen.

It is necessary for a moment, that the scene of my story should be transferred to the cold and foggy, but highly respectable island I have just named. About that time, in the Strand, street of London, there was an Italian Opera House called the King's Theatre, which, during King George, contributed a thousand guineas every night in order to encourage his nobility toward the patronage of that splendid but exotic entertainment. During the winter season of 17— the principal Italian singer was not the King's Theatre was the famous Lusignines. Her real name was Genevieve, Bobbo; but she was justly entitled to her daughter of the Lusignines, for never was either the great or twist them round her little finger as she could. A fetest scandal, and it is therefore sufficient to say that La Lusignina had ever been in the eyes of King George, who, if you remember, had left his lawful wife in Hanover, and was growing to that unfortunate Königsmark affair, on the best of terms with her. Now, La Lusignina was exceedingly fond of money, likewise of monkeys, and of macaroni; but for diamonds she had a perfect passion. I believe that she had tried her best she would have flattered King George out of the crown jewels, although, constitutionally speaking, there were not to be give away; but she chose to take into her capricious head a violent longing for that part of the Order of the Pig and Whistle which consisted of the Great Schweinsfleisch diamond. The king often wore it in private—although the gross Englanders laughed at it—for he loved every thing that reminded him of Germania. The Lusinghiera plainly told him that she would give him no more partridges and cabbage—of which dish he was immoderately fond—for supper, unless he made her a present of the much-coveted decoration. He expostulated at first, but the end of it was that the fatuous king satisfied her greed.

Partial as the Italian singing-woman was to diamonds for their natural beauty, she did not also disdain them for their intrinsic value. Her curiosity to know how much the great Schweinsfleisch diamond was worth in hard cash had speedily an opportunity of being gratified. It chanced that she wanted some ready money—say a couple of thousand guineas. As King George happened to be at Hampton Court, and she had been tugging somewhat violently at the royal purse-strings lately, La Lusinghiera condescended to seek temporary assistance from a financier who was always ready to grant it on the slight condition of some tangible security, worth at least three times the amount, being deposited with him. In fine, she stepped into her chariot, and was driven to Cranbourn Alley, to the shop of Mr. Tribulation Triball, pawnbroker. There, producing the Order of the Pig and Whistle from its grand morocco case, whereon were emblazoned the united arms of England and Schweinhundhausen ("like the fellow's impudence," King George had muttered, when he first opened his cousin's gift), she dwelt on the beauty of the great Schweinsfleisch diamond, and demanded the sum of which she stood in need.

Mr. Tribulation Triball was a discreet man, who asked very few questions in business. He would have lent money on the great seal of England, or on the Lord Mayor's mace, had either of those valuables been brought to him by ladies or gentlemen of his acquaintance. He examined the decoration very carefully; pronounced the setting to be very pretty; but, with a low bow, regretted his inability to advance more than fifty pounds on the entire ornament.

"Fifty pounds!" screamed the Lusinghiera in a rage. "What do you mean, fellow?"

"I mean, honored Madam," replied the pawnbroker, with another low bow, "that fifty pounds is very nearly the actual value of the gold and the small stones; and for fashion, as you are well aware, we allow nothing."

"Al Diavolo, your fashion!" exclaimed La Lusinghiera; "I have sacks full of gold brooches and small stones at home. 'Tis on the great diamond that I want two thousand guineas."

"Which sum I should be both proud and happy to lend," observed the pawnbroker, "but for the unfortunate circumstance that the great centre stone happens to be not worth sixpence. It is false, Madam—false as a Brummagem tester."

"False!" yelled La Lusinghiera.

"False," repeated Mr. Triball. "A marvelous good copy, I grant you, but it will not deceive such an old hand as I am. It must be one of the famous paste imitations of Father Schink. However, your ladyship must not go away empty-handed. Let us see whether we can not arrange a small loan on a note of hand."

I don't know what sum La Lusinghiera managed to borrow from Mr. Tribulation Triball; but it is certain that she did not leave the great Schweinsfleisch diamond with him in pledge. She went home in a rage, and as soon as his majesty came back from Hampton Court, she had with him what is termed in modern parlance an "explication."

Let us now return to Schweinhundhausen. It was on the twenty-fourth of August, 17—, precisely twelve months from the day when the introducer of embassadors, Von Schaffundkalben, had started on his mission, that an English courier arrived at the Residenz, and handed a packet to the high chamberlain, who in turn handed it to His Mansuetude. Ludwig Adolf received it with a smile, and ordered the courier to be sumptuously entertained in the buttery. He came from his cousin of England, and the grand-duke felt certain that he must be the bearer of at least the British Order of the Garter.

Ludwig the Terrible opened the packet, perused a letter which it contained, and was soon afterward seen to turn blue. Then he tore open the inner envelope of the packet and turned crimson. Then he cast something upon the ground and trampled it beneath his heel. Then he ordered his yellow stockings. Then he began to curse and to kick his pages. Eventually he turned to the high chamberlain, flung him the letter, and thundered forth, "Read that!"

The missive was not from the King of England, but from his majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who, in terms of contemptuous frigidity, "begged leave to return the spurious jewel sent to his Britannic Majesty, and had the honor to remain."

By this time Ludwig the Terrible was foaming at the mouth. "Spurious," he gasped, "spurious! I see it all. Rascal, robber. Quick, twelve halberdiers, and let Abimelech Ben Azi, and the dog who is his journeyman, be brought hither."

It was about twelve at noon that Jochabad Spass was smoking his after-dinner pipe—they dined at eleven in Schweinhundhausen—at the door of his master's shop in the Judengasse. He looked up the street and down the street, when suddenly round the corner which gave on to the Hof-Kirche-Platz, he saw two of the yellow and black halberdiers make their appearance. The Court Jew's house was just at the other extremity of the street, and as soon as Jochabad saw halberdiers one and two succeeded by halberdiers three and four, than Jochabad Spass, who, if he were indeed a dog, was a very sly one, slipped round the corner of the opposite extremity of the street.

"Good-by to Schweinhundhausen," he said, philosophically, running meanwhile as fast as his legs would carry him. "There is a storm brewing. It will be a bad day for the house-father. What a pity I had not time to secure the casket!"

The twelve halberdiers arrived at Abimelech Ben Azi's house, seized upon that unfortunate Israelite, and, notwithstanding the entreaties of his wife and children, bound his hands tightly behind his back, and playfully plodded him up the Judengasse, across the Hof-Kirche-Platz, and so through the avenue of linden-trees to the Residenz.

But he was not received in the Hall of Audience. No; the Hall of Justice was the destination of the wretched man. As a preliminary measure he was taken into the guard-room and loaded with heavy fetters, and then he was dragged down a couple of flight of slimy stairs into this so much dreaded Hall of Justice—a gloomy, underground apartment, supported by massive stone pillars, and illumined only by two grated windows on a level with the pavement of the court-yard.

At the upper end of the hall sat Ludwig the Terrible in a great crimson arm-chair. Facing him, a few paces distant, was another chair, empty, and behind it stood, mute and grim, a swarthy man in a blacksmith's apron, and with his sleeves rolled up to the elbows, whom the unfortunate Ben Azi knew well to be Hans Dummergeist, sworn scourger, headsman, and tormentor to the Grand Duke.

"Good-day, Mr. Court Jew," said Ludwig Adolf, with affected courtesy, as the prisoner was brought in tottering between two halberdiers. "What is the course of exchange, Mr. Court Jew?"

The miserable man's lips moved convulsively, but he could articulate nothing.

"What is the price of diamonds?" the Grand Duke continued, his voice rising to a yell of derision. "How stands the great Schweinsfleisch diamond quoted in the market?"

The Court Jew made a desperate effort: "The great Schweinsfleisch diamond," he faltered, "did not your highness intrust it to me to set, and did you not send it as centre-piece of the Grand Cross of the Order of the Pig and Whistle to his Majesty the King of England?"

"Oh, inconceivably mangy and thievish dog," roared Ludwig Adolf, now losing all command of himself, "behold and tremble!" And he thrust beneath the nose of the unhappy Court Jew an open leathern case, in which he saw lying in confused fragments the decoration he had made, and in its midst the spurious diamond.

"Court Jew," continued Ludwig Adolf, with a growl like that of a hungry bear, "you and I will pass the afternoon together. But first, egregious and impudent knave, where is the diamond—the real diamond—the great Schweinsfleisch diamond you have robbed me of?"

In vain did Abimelech Ben Azi protest that he knew nothing about it; that he had set the real stone as he had been ordered to do; that it must have been taken out, and a false one substituted for it in England; that he was as innocent as the babe unborn. He was, by the command of the Grand Duke, bound down in the great arm-chair facing that tyrant, and to extort confession the dreadful infliction known as the Osnaburg torture was applied to him. For a long time he held out; but after three applications of the torture—after the boots had been applied to his legs and the thumbscrews to his fingers, his fortitude gave way, and in scarce audible accents he confessed his guilt, and described the place beneath the flooring of his work-shop, where, in its iron casket, the great Schweinsfleisch diamond was to be found. The fury of Ludwig Adolf was still further heightened, when, commanding Jochabad Spass to be brought before him in order that he too, as with grim facetiousness he expressed it, might make "a journey to Osnaburg," he was informed that the long journeyman had escaped. How he managed it was never known, but from that day Jochabad Spass was never seen in Schweinhundhausen.

Another detachment of halberdiers, accompanied by the high chamberlain, was dispatched with chisels and sledge-hammers to the Judengasse, and during their absence restoratives were forced down the throat of Abimelech Ben Azi, who remained still bound to the arm-chair, Ludwig Adolf glaring upon him like a boa-constrictor upon a rabbit.

In half an hour's time the messengers returned with an iron casket, which with their united strength they had not been able to break open. The deplorable Court Jew, however, made signs that the key would be found hung round his neck. Search being made, this proved to be the case, and at length the long ravished gem was placed in the hands of Ludwig the Terrible.

I have heard that the tyrant kissed it, and fondled it, and called it by endearing names; then that taking the true diamond in one hand and the false one in the other, he thrust each alternately beneath the nose of his captive, crying, "Smell it, Mr. Court Jew, smell it!" I have heard that all the tortures the wretched creature had already undergone were repeated over and over again in sheer wantonness; that the false diamond was heated in a brazier, and, held between pincers, forced into the prisoner's naked flesh. His screams were appalling. Two of the halberdiers fainted. Even the sworn tormentor was heard to mutter "Es ist genug." On being called upon for an explanation, he replied that he did not consider the patient could endure any more without nature giving way.

"It is enough then," Luwig Adolf the Seventy-fourth acquiesced with a darkling scowl. "Mr. Sworn Headsman be good enough to fetch your sword this way."

At the mention of the word sword Abimelech Ben Azi, who had been in a semi-swoon, set up a horrifying yell. In the most piteous terms he besought forgiveness. He essayed to drag himself toward his persecutor, as though to embrace his knees, when, in his frantic efforts, he lost his balance, and the heavy chair fell over on the top of him as he, still bound to it, groveled at the feet of Ludwig the Terrible.

"Set him up again," thundered the merciless prince; "and, headsman, dispatch. I'll teach him to steal my diamonds!"

The last dreadful deed was soon done. The headsman brought his long sharp sword—a double-handed one with a hollow blade filled with quicksilver, which, as the point was depressed, ran downward from the hilt, giving increased momentum to the blow. The headsman was as expert as those generally are who serve absolute monarchs. Grasping the hilt of his weapon with both hands, and inclining his body backward and laterally he swept off with one semi-circular blow the head of Abimelech Ben Azi. Again the body with its chair fell forward at the feet of the tyrant—the head rolled many paces away, and a cascade of blood sprinkled the faces and dresses of the terrified beholders.

It is said that one blood-drop from this shower fell upon the great Schweinsfleisch diamond, which the grand-duke, as though loth to part with it, still held in his hand. With a horrid laugh he licked the gout from the surface of the stone, and spurning the body of the Court Jew with his foot, stalked up stairs to carouse with his ruffians. When he staggered into his bedchamber late that night, he put his hand in his pocket to take forth the diamond. It felt wet and clammy, and when he brought it to the light it was dabbled in blood.

On the twenty-fourth of August in every year, every year that has elapsed since that frightful scene in the Hall of Justice at Schweinhundhausen—from sunrise until sunset—a drop of blood stands on that fatal diamond. It has gone through strange vicissitudes, passed through many hands, been an heir-loom in many families; but that drop of gore has never failed to make its appearance on the great Schweinsfleisch diamond on the anniversary of the murder of Abimelech Ben Azi, the Court Jew, by Ludwig Adolf the Seventy-fourth, of Schweinhundhausen, surnamed the Terrible.

JESSIE UNDERHILL'S THANKSGIVING.

It was the evening before Thanksgiving.

The great maples in the door-yard that had blazed so long in russet and golden fire had showered the last withered leaves upon the path; the creeping vine on the piazza columns glowed scarlet in the misty autumn air, and the woods in the valley were stained with the bloody footsteps of many a midnight frost. And yet Hezekiah Underhill, standing pensively polishing his spectacles before the fire, was not satisfied with Nature's great kaleidoscope of color.

"It don't seem just right!" soliloquized Hezekiah, "not to have a genuine snow-storm afore Thanksgivin'!"

"Take things as you find 'em, father!" said Mrs. Hezekiah, a stirring body who never stood still long enough to give a wrinkle time to settle down on her face, and whose coffee-colored cap ribbons, owing to "perpetual motion," seemed exactly like brown birds continually on the wing. "Elder Jones says there's nothin' but what's for the best!"

"Well there's no harm in wishin', I s'pose," said Hezekiah, argumentatively.

"No," said Mrs. Underhill; "but if I was goin' to wish, 'twouldn't be for such a little thing as a fall o' snow. I know what I'd give a big apple for."

"What?" questioned Hezekiah, rather surprised at his contented helpmate's expressing any ungratified desire.

The little woman fluttered up close to him, and there was a liquid glimmer in the eyes she raised to his face.

"Think of the many, many empty seats there'll be around the Thanksgivin' firesides to-morrow, Hezekiah! Oh, if I could have my wish, I'd bring 'em all back from the graves upon the battle-field, and from the weary hospitals. Think of our Jared, keepin' guard along the Potomac; think of Hiram Steele's brave boy wounded under the very flag he fought for and dying in a strange land!"

"Do you think he will die, Aunt Mary?"

A slight figure was clinging to Hezekiah's arm, and a pale, pretty face, with bands of shining black hair and wild startled eyes, was turned upward in breathless suspense.

"There now, I do say for't, I never meant she should hear! I s'posed she was up stairs!" ejaculated the flurried old lady. "No, dear, I hope he'll get better; any way it's our duty to hope for the best. That's what Elder Jones said only last Sabbath day!"

"Uncle, tell me, do they think he will die?" repeated the girl, turning to the old man, as if she had neither heard nor heeded her aunt's words.

"Child, how should I know? You've asked me that self-same question forty times this last week if you've asked it once," said Hezekiah, good-humoredly. "S'posin' he don't get well, why should you fret about it? When he went away, six months ago, you was a-flirtin' with Harry Mossmore, and playin' with his feelins just exactly as our cat teases a mouse. Didn't I hear you with my own ears tellin' Frank Steele he was nothin' more'n a friend to you, and you wondered at his presumption in ever supposin' he could be any thing more?"

"I never meant it, uncle!" sobbed the girl, "never! It was that mad spirit of coquetry that possessed me, I scarce know how. The words had not passed my lips before I would have given worlds to recall them. But oh! the punishment is greater than I can bear. Tell me, uncle, do they believe he will die? Oh, if I could die, too!"

"He is in God's hands, my child," said the old man, solemnly, "and He who raised the widow's son at Nain, and brought Lazarus back to life, will not fail to do all things well. Trust in Him, Jessie, and pray to Him."

Jessie Underhill scarce heard the old man's words; she had resumed her seat by the window, and was gazing sadly out upon the gold and incarnadine of the sunset as it flamed above the western pine forests, likening it in her own mind to the flash of cannon and the dreadful stains of blood upon the battle-field. And with the throbbings of her heart rose and fell the treasured bit of paper cut from the list of "Wounded" in the daily journal, and containing but one line—"Francis Steele, Private, Dangerously."

Hezekiah Underhill looked at his niece's drooping figure, while strange contortions passed over his weather-beaten features. Once or twice he opened his mouth and shut it again with a click like the spring of a steel trap; once or twice he made an involuntary step toward her, and then resumed his former posture as if by an effort.

"No, no!" he muttered between his teeth, fairly beating a retreat, and never pausing until he was out under the tossing boughs of the old maples. "She's daughter, and niece, and every thing else to me; but I can't do it! It would spoil all! Poor Jessie, poor little broken-hearted dove!"

Was Hezekiah Underhill demented that he should break out into that strange smothered chuckle, even while the tears were streaming down his cheeks? Certain it was that he conducted himself very strangely all that evening, reading the newspaper with its columns upside down, depositing the pitcher of cider in his wife's work-basket, and finally bringing down on his devoted head that lady's remonstrances by stirring the fire with his snuff-box, and trying to put the poker in his waistcoat pocket.

"Hezekiah, are you crazy?" ejaculated Mrs. Underhill.

"Well, no, not exactly," said Hezekiah, sheepishly; "but I do feel kind o' elevated. Come up to the fire, Jessie; don't sit 'way off in the cold. That's right, puss—nestle down in your old chimney-corner seat. That's the way you and Frank Steele used to sit together when you were children."

"Father!" exclaimed Mrs. Underhill, reproachfully, as Jessie burst out crying, with her face hidden on her aunt's knee.

"I didn't mean to," apologized Hezekiah; but even then his face was in a glow with something brighter than the genial shine of the fire-light.

It was evident that Hezekiah was glorying in the mystery of some wonderful secret. And never did any secret struggle so desperately for disclosure as Hezekiah's on that Thanksgiving eve. But he kept it. For the honor of mankind let it be recorded that Hezekiah Underhill kept his secret.

Of course it's no use trying. Soyer himself, even were he gifted with the descriptive powers of the wizard of Waverley, never could have given you any idea of Mrs. Underhill's Thanksgiving dinner. The brown, crackling turkey, unctuous with stuffing and oleaginous with rivulets of gravy; the pyramids of crimson quivering jellies; the green crisp pickles; the battalion of pumpkin-pies, nestling like amber lakelets in shores of russet crust; the pudding, a triumphant mystery of culinary art; the whole dictionary would fall short in expressing the plenteous glories of that feast of fatness.

Hezekiah disappeared soon after breakfast—whither he had gone nobody knew, for all the explanation he vouchsafed to his wife was that he "was goin' to bring company home to dinner." But punctual to the noon-mark on the kitchen-floor he returned, and not alone.

Jessie was in her own room, thinking sorrowfully and crying a little between whiles, when Mrs. Underhill came up with flushed cheek and a voice strangely tremulous.

"Darling, your uncle wants you to come down stairs!"

"Indeed, aunt, I had rather not;" and Jessie shrank involuntarily into her chair.

"But he has brought home a friend, dear, and would like—"

"Oh no, aunt! Please let me stay here—I have such a dread of strange faces just now."

"My dearest, but your uncle particularly wishes it! Come, there's a good girl!—let me smooth your hair and put on your pink-ribbon bows. Now you look sweetly!"

Mrs. Underhill's hand shook and her eyes overflowed while she fastened the simple brooch in Jessie's collar.

"Why, aunty, what's the matter?"

"Nothing, Jessie—nothing. Come, are you ready?"

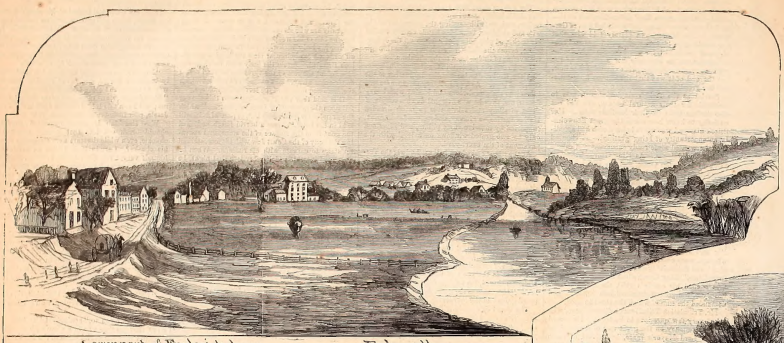
Hezekiah Underhill stood in the middle of the room as they entered; and beside him Jessie's bewildered vision took cognizance of yet another figure.

She stopped with dilated eyes and pallid cheek; her brain seemed in a whirl; but when the mist cleared from her sight she was clasped to Frank Steele's breast—the noble breast that had borne the brunt of battle's fiercest tide—the breast that should evermore be her shelter and her resting-place!

"Jessie, will you take me, pale, and scarred, and sickly? Will you be my wife?"

"I will love you all my life long!"

That was all they said—but it was enough.

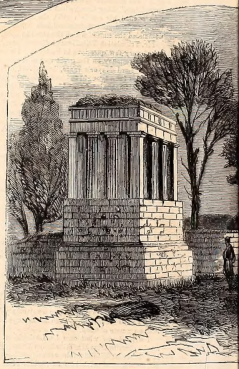


"But, Frank, tell me how it all happened!"

"It was your uncle's plot, love. I was lying in the hospital—sick, wounded, dying, as I thought—when his letter came, telling me of your remorse at what you fancied was your unkindness. It was written without your knowledge; but, Jessie, it was like a draught of immortality, an elixir of life to me. I grew better under the very eyes of the surgeon, who had told me I was a doomed man. And here I am, on sick leave, to hear my happiness again from your own lips."

The sweet lips confirmed his hope—but it was not in words!

"I declare," said Hezekiah, rubbing his hands gleefully, "it seems jest like a story in a printed book! But there was one time I thought I should have let the cat out of the bag—when you sat cryin' by the window last night, Jessie. But I'm glad I didn't tell. Frank wanted to surprise you, and I guess he's done it!"



Frank Steele, sitting before the merry Thanksgiving blaze, with Jessie's hand in his, felt that the great reward for all those midnight watches and perilous battles had come at last. May every gallant soldier in the land reap the same sweet harvest!

THE SIXTH SCENE.

ST. JOHN'S WOOD.

CHAPTER I.

Ir wanted little more than a fortnight to Christmas; but the weather showed no signt yet of the frost and snow, conventionally associated with the season. The atmosphere was unnaturally warm; and the old year was dying feebly in sapping rain and enervating mist.

Toward the close of the December afternoon Magdalen sat alone in the lodging which she had occupied since her arrival in London. The fire burned sluggishly in the narrow little grate; the view of the wet house and soaking garden opposite was darkening fast; and the bell of the suburban muffin-boy tinkled in the distance drearily. Sitting close over the fire, with a little money lying loose in her lap, Magdalen absently shifted the coins to and fro on the smooth surface of her dress; incessantly altering their positions toward each other, as if they were pieces of a child's "puzzle" which she was trying to put together. The dim firelight flaming up on her faintly from time to time showed changes which must have taken place in her suddenly to friends of former days. Her dress had become loose through the waning of her figure; but she had not cared to alter it. The old restlessness in her movements, the old mobility in her expression, appeared no more. Her face passively maintained its haggard composure, its changeless, unnatural calm. Mr. Pendrell might have softened his hard sentence on her if he had seen her now; and Mrs. Leccount, in the plenitude of her triumph, might have declared her fallen enemy at last.

Hardly four months had passed since the wedding-day at Aldborough; and the penalty for that day was paid already—paid in unavailing remorse, in hopeless dejection, in premature bodily fear! Let this be said for her; let the truth which has been told of the fault be told of the expiation as well. Let it be recorded of her that she enjoyed no secret triumph on the day of her success. The power of herself with which her own act had inspired her had risen to its climax when the design of her marriage was achieved. She had never suffered in secret as she suffered when the Combe-Raven money was left to her in her husband's will. She had never felt the means taken to control her so fiercely and unrelentingly as goading to herself as she felt them on the day when the seal was reached. Those who thought had grown the remorse which had hurried her to seek pardon and consolation in her sister's love. Never since I first entered her house—never since she had first felt it sacred to her at her father's grave, had the Purpose to which her life vowed herself so nearly lost its hold on her as at this time. Never might Norah's influence have achieved such a sway as on the day when her influence was lost—the day when the fatal words were overheard at Miss Garth's—the day when the fatal letter from Scotland told of Mrs. Leccount's revenge.

The hour was done, the chance was gone. Time and Hope alike had both passed her by.

Faintly and more faintly the inner voices now pleaded with her to pursue the plan she had once set. Its discovery which had poisoned her heart with its first discovery of her sister; the shock which had followed it of her husband's death; the sting of Mrs. Leccount's triumph, felt through all, had done their work. The remorse which had made a bitterer bed marriage life was deadened now to a dull despair. It was too late to make any amendment of confession—too late to lay bare to the miserable husband the deeper secrets that had since lurked in the heart of the innocent wife. Innocent of all thought of the hideous treachery which Mrs. Leccount had imputed to her, she was guilty of knowing how his health was broken when she married him; guilty of knowing, when he left her to the fatal drive down Shooter's Hill, accident of a moment, harmless to other men, might place him at her disposal, and effect her release. His death had left her free, had laid her plainly what she had shrunk in his lifetime from openly avowing, from the bitter pain of the dull torment of that reproach; from the dreary wretchedness of doubting every body, even to Norah herself, from the bitter shame of her defeated schemes; from the blank solitude of her friendless life, and from perhaps more that no one refuge now. She turned to the relentless Purpose which was hurrying her to her ruin, and cried to it with the daring of her despair—Drive me on!

For days and days together she had bent her mind on the one object which occupied it since she had received the lawyer's letter. For days and days together she had toiled to meet the first necessity of her position—to find a means of discovering the Secret Trust. There was no hospitable time of assistance from Captain Wragge. Any proposition he had made to the gentleman an adept in the art of vanishing. The flow of the moral agriculturist left no furrows—not a trace of him was to be found. The Captain's combe was too cautious to commit himself to an active course of any kind; he passively maintained his opinion, and left the rest to his client —he desired to know nothing until the Trust was placed in his hands. Magdalen's interests were now in Magdalen's own sole care. Risk or no risk, what she did next she must do by herself.

The prospect had not daunted her. Alone she had calculated the chances that might be tried. Alone she was now determined to make the attempt.

"If time has come," she said to herself, as she sat over the fire. "I must sound Louisa first."

She collected the scattered coins in her lap, and placed them in a little heap on the table-then rose and rang the bell. The landlady answered it.

"Is my servant down stairs?" inquired Magdalen.

"Yes, ma'am. She is having her tea."

"When she has done, say I want her up here. Wait a moment. You will find your money on the table—the money I owe you for last week. Can you find it? or would you like to have a candle?"

"It's rather dark, ma'am."

Magdalen lit a candle. "What notice must I give you," she asked, as she put the candle on the table, "before I leave?"

"A week is the usual notice, ma'am. I hope you have no reason to complain of the lodgings?"

"None whatever. I only ask the question because I may be obliged to leave these lodgings rather sooner than I had expected. Is the money right?"

"Quite right, ma'am. Here is your receipt."

"Thank you. Don't forget to send Louisa to me as soon as she has done her tea."

The landlady left the room. As soon as she was alone again Magdalen extinguished the candle, and drew an empty chair close to her own near the fire. She done, she seemed her former place, and waited until Louisa appeared.

There was doubt in her face as she looked mechanically into the fire. "A poor chance," she thought to herself; "but, poor as it is, a chance I must try."

In ten minutes more Louisa's meek knock was softly audible on the door. She was surprised on entering the room to find no other light in it than the light of the fire.

"Will you have the candles, ma'am?" she inquired, respectfully.

"We will have the candles if you wish for them yourself," replied Magdalen; "not otherwise. I have something to say to you. When you have done, you shall decide whether we sit together in the dark or in the light."

Louisa waited near the door, and listened to those strange words with astonishment.

"Come here," said Magdalen, pointing to the empty chair; "and sit down by the fire."

Louisa advanced and timidly removed the chair from its position at her mistress's side. Magdalen pointedly moved it back. "No!" she said. "Come closer—come close by me." After a moment's nervous hesitation Louisa placed herself.

"I ask you to sit near me," pursued Magdalen, "because I want to speak to you on equal terms. Whatever distinctions there might once have been between us are now at an end. I am a lonely woman friendless and helpless in resources, without rank or place in the world. I may or may not have been the friend of my mistress and maid the connexion between us must come to an end."

"Oh, ma'am, don't, don't say that!" pleaded Louisa, faintly.

Magdalen sorrowfully and steadily went on.

"When you first came to me," she resumed, "I thought I should not like you. I have learned to like you. I have learned to be grateful to you. From first to last you have been faithful and good to me. The least I can do in return is to tell you that I have no other future prospects."

"You don't send me away, ma'am!" said Louisa, imploringly. "If you can only help me with a little money now and then, I'll wait for my wages—I will indeed."

Magdalen took her hand, and went on as sorrowfully and as steadily as before.

"My child, it is impossible, all uncertainly," she said. "The next step I take may lead me to my grave—it may lead me to any ruin. Can I ask you to share such a prospect as this? If your future was as uncertain as mine is—if you, too, were a friendless young woman in the world—my conscience might be easy in letting you choose. But you have friends. I might accept your attachment, for I might feel I was not wronging you. How can I feel this in your case? Look at me, and look at yourself. You are an excellent servant; you can get another place on your next place than mine. You can refer to me; and if the character I give is not considered sufficient, you can refer to the mistress you served before me."

At the instant when that reference to the girl's last mistress escaped Magdalen's lips Louisa snatched her hand away and started up to a height softly from her chair. There was a moment's silence. Both mistress and servant were overtaken by surprise. Magdalen was the first to recover herself.

"Is it getting too dark?" she asked, significantly. "Are you going to light the candles after all?"

Louisa drew back into the dimmest corner of the room.

"You suspect me, ma'am!" she answered out of the darkness in a breathless whisper. "Who has told you? How did you find out?" She stopped and burst into tears.

"I deserve your suspicion," she said, struggling to compose herself. "I don't deserve to go. You have treated me so kindly; you have made me so fond of you! Forgive me, Mrs. Vanstone—I am a wretch; I have deceived you."

"Come here, and sit down by me again," said Magdalen. "Come—or I will get up myself and bring you back."

Louisa timidly returned to her place. Dim as the firelight was, she seemed to fear it. She held her handkerchief over her face, and shrank from her mistress as she seated herself again in the chair.

"You are wrong in thinking that any one has betrayed you to me," said Magdalen. "All that I know of you is what your own looks and ways have told me. You have had some secret trouble weighing on your mind ever since you have been in my service. I confess I have spoken with the wish to find out more of you and your past life than I have found out yet—not because I am curious, but because I have my secret troubles too. Are you an unhappy woman, like me? If you are, I will not pry into my confidence. If you have nothing to tell me —if you choose to keep your secret—I don't blame you; I ask you to keep it. But I must ask how you have deceived me. I will only remember that you have been an honest, and faithful, and considerate servant while I have employed you—and I will say as much in your favor to any new mistress you like to send to me."

She waited for the reply. For a moment, and only for a moment, Louisa hesitated. The girl's nature was weak, but not depraved. She was honestly attached to her present mistress in spite of the wrong which Magdalen had not expected from her.

"If you are away, ma'am," she said, "I won't take my character from you till I have told you the truth; I won't return your kindness by deceiving you any time. Did my master ever tell you how he engaged me?"

"No. I never asked him, and he never told me."

"He engaged me, ma'am, with a written character—"

"Yes?"

"The character was a false one."

Magdalen drew back in amazement. The confession she heard was not the confession she had anticipated.

"Did your mistress refuse to give you a character?" she asked. "Why?"

Louisa dropped her knees and hid her face in her mistress's lap. "Don't ask me!" she said. "Oh, ma'am, I'm so ashamed to tell you! I'm not fit to be in the same room with you!"

Magdalen bent over her, and whispered a question in her ear. Louisa whispered back the one sad word of reply.

"Has he deserted you?" asked Magdalen, after waiting a moment, and thinking first.

"No."

"Do you love him?"

"Dearly."

The remembrance of her own loveless marriage stung Magdalen to the quick.

"For God's sake, don't kneel to me!" she cried, passionately. "If there is a degraded woman in this room I am the woman, and not you!"

She raised the girl by main force from her knees, and put her back in the chair. They both waited a little in silence. Keeping her hand on Louisa's shoulder, Magdalen seated herself again, and looked with an unutterable bitterness of contempt at the fire. "Oh, my God," she thought, "what happy women there are in the world! Wives who love their husbands! Mothers who are not ashamed to own their children! Are you quieter?" she asked, gently addressing Louisa once more. "Can you answer me, if I ask you a few more questions?" Where is the child?"

"The child is out at nurse."

"Does the father help to support it?"

"He does all he can, ma'am."

"What is the man in service?" Is he in trade?"

"His father is a master-carpenter—he works in his father's yard."

"If he has got work, why has he not married you?"

"It's his father's fault, ma'am—not his. His father has no pity on us. He would be turned out of house and home if he married me."

"Can he get no work elsewhere?"

"He has got good work in London, ma'am. There are so many in London—they take the bread out of each other's mouths. If he left his father, he might have to emigrate, he would have married me long since."

"Would he marry you if you had the money now?"

"I am sure he would, ma'am. He could get plenty of work to do at home, and double and treble the wages he gets here. He is trying hard, and I am trying hard, to save a little toward it—but it's a long figure from my child. But it is so little! If we live for years to come, there seems no hope for us. I know I have done wrong every way; I know I don't deserve to be happy. But how could I let my child suffer?—how could I let him and me be parted forever? My mistress was hard on me, and my health broke down in trying to keep my place. My mistress would have deceived my body by a false character if there had been another chance for me. I was alone with temptation, and I fell. Seventy ask you to forgive me."

"Ask better women than I am," said Magdalen, sadly. "I am only fit to feel for you; and I do feel for you with all my heart. In your place I should have gone into service with a false character too. Say no more of the past —you don't know how you hurt me in speaking of it. Look to the future. I think I can help you, and do you no harm. I think you can help me. Will you accept me as your friend in return. Wait and you shall hear what I mean. Suppose you were married, how much would it cost for you and your husband to emigrate?"

Louisa mentioned the cost of a steerage passage to Australia for a man and his wife. She spoke in low, hopeless tones. Moderate as the sum was, it looked like unattainable wealth in her eyes.

Magdalen started in her chair and took the girl's hand once more.

"Louisa!" she said, earnestly, "if I gave you the money what would you do for me in return?"

The proposal seemed to strike Louisa speechless. She trembled violently. She trembled violently, and said nothing. Magdalen repeated her words.

"Oh, ma'am, you mean it!" said the girl. "Do you really mean it?"

"Yes," replied Magdalen, "I really mean it. What would you do for me in return?"

"Do?" repeated Louisa. "Oh, what is there I would not do?" She tried to take her mistress's hand, but Magdalen would not permit it. She resolutely, almost roughly, drew her hand away.

"Remember, you owe me nothing yet," she said. "We are serving each other—that is all. Sit quiet and let me think."

For the next ten minutes there was silence in the room. At the end of that time Magdalen took out her watch and held it close to the grate. There was just firelight enough to show her the hour. It was close on six o'clock.

"Are you sufficiently recruited to go down stairs and deliver a message?" she asked, rising from her chair as she spoke to Louisa again. "It is a very simple message—it is only to tell the boy that I want a cab as soon as he can get me one. I must go out immediately. You shall know why later in the evening. I have much more to say to you, but there is no time to say it now. Tell the boy to come bring your work with you and wait for my return. I shall be back before bedtime."

Without another word of explanation she hurriedly lit a candle and withdrew into the bedroom to put on her bonnet and shawl.

CHAPTER II.

Between nine and ten o'clock the same evening Louisa was sitting anxiously at the long-expected knock at the house-door. She ran down stairs at once and let her mistress in.

Magdalen's face was flushed. She showed far more agitation on returning to the house than she had shown on leaving it. "Keep your place at the table," she said to Louisa, impatiently, "but lay aside your work. I want you to attend to what I am going to say."

Louisa obeyed. Magdalen seated herself at the opposite side of the table and placed the candles so as to obtain a clear and uninterrupted view of her servant's face.

"I have noticed a respectable elderly woman," she began abruptly, "who has been here once or twice in the last fortnight to pay me a visit."

"Yes, ma'am; I think I let her in the second time she came. An elderly person named Mrs. Attwood?"

"That is the person I mean. Mrs. Attwood is the housekeeper to a housekeeper; and housekeeper at his private residence, but the housekeeper at his offices in Lincoln's Inn. I promised to drink tea with her one evening this week, and I have been to-night. It is unnecessary to say it not, to me that familiar terms with a woman in Mrs. Attwood's situation?"

Louisa made no answer in words. Her face spoke for her: she could hardly avoid thinking it strange.

"I had a motive for making friends with Mrs. Attwood," Magdalen went on. "She is a widow with a little family of children. Her daughters are all in service. One of them is an under-housemaid, in the service of Admiral Bartram, at St. Crux-in-the-Marsh. I found that out from Mrs. Attwood's master; and as soon as I arrived at the discovery I made up my mind to make Mrs. Attwood's acquaintance. Stranger still, is it not?"

Louisa began to look a little uneasy. Her mistress's manner was at variance with her mistress's words—it was plainly suggestive of something serious in reserve.

"What attraction Mrs. Attwood finds in my society," Magdalen continued, "I am not prepared to say. I can only tell you she has seen better days; she is an educated person; and she may like me for that reason. At any rate she has readily met my advances toward her. What my intention I find in the good woman on my side is soon told. I have a great curiosity—an unaccountable curiosity you will think—about the present course of Admiral Bartram's affairs at St. Crux-in-the-Marsh. Mrs. Attwood's daughter is a good girl, and constantly writes to her mother. The mother is proud of the letters and proud of the girl, and is ready enough to talk about her daughter's and her daughter's place. That is Mrs. Attwood's attraction to me. You understand so far?"

"Yes—perfectly, ma'am—understood."

"Thanks to Mrs. Attwood and Mrs. Attwood's daughter," she said, "I know some curious particulars already of the household at St. Crux-in-the-Marsh. Several servants have come—as I need not tell you—are oftener occupied with their own affairs and successes than their mistress and mistresses suppose. The only mistress at St. Crux is the housekeeper. But there is a master—Admiral Bartram. He appears to be a strange old man, whose whims and fancies amuse his servants as well as his friends. One of his fancies, which no one would possibly perceive to notice) is, that he had men enough about him when he was living at sea, and that now he is living on shore he will be waited on by women-servants alone. The one man in the house is an old sailor, who has been all his life with his master—he is a kind of pensioner at St. Crux, and has little or nothing to do with the housework. The other servants indoors are all women; and instead of a footman to wait on him at dinner the admiral has a parlor-maid. The parlor-maid now at St. Crux is engaged to be married, and as soon as her master can suit himself she is going away. These discoveries I made some days since. But when I saw Mrs. Attwood to-night she had received another letter from her daughter in the interval; and that letter has helped me to find out something more. The housekeeper is at her wit's end to find a new servant. Her master insists on youth and good looks—he leaves every thing else to his housekeeper—but he will have that. All the inquiries made in the neighborhood have failed to produce the sort of parlor-maid whom the admiral wants. If nothing can be done in the next fortnight or three weeks the housekeeper will advertise in the Times, and will come to London herself to see the applicants, and to make strict personal inquiry into their characters."

Louisa looked at her mistress more attentively than ever. The expression of perplexity left her face, and a shade of disappointment appeared there in its stead.

"Bear in mind what I have said," pursued Magdalen; "and wait a minute more while I ask you some questions. Don't think you understand me yet—I can assure you you don't understand me. Have you always lived in service as lady's-maid?"

"No, ma'am."

"Have you ever lived as parlor-maid?"

"Only in one place, ma'am—and not for long there."

"I suppose you lived long enough to learn your duties?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"What were your duties, besides waiting at table?"

"I had to show visitors in."

"Yes—and what else?"

"I had the plate and the glass to look after, and the table-linen was all under my care. I had to answer all the bells except in the bedrooms. There were other little odds and ends sometimes to do—"

"But your regular duties were the duties you have just mentioned?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"How long ago is it since you lived in service as parlor-maid?"

"A little better than two years, ma'am."

"I suppose you have not forgotten how to wait at table, and clean plate, and the rest of it, in that time?"

At this question Louisa's attention, which had been wandering more and more during the progress of her mistress's inquiries, wandered away altogether. Her gathering anxieties got the better of her discretion and even of her timidity. Instead of answering her mistress, she suddenly and confusedly ventured on a question of her own.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," she said. "Did you mean me to offer for the parlor-maid's place at St. Crux?"

"You?" replied Magdalen. "Certainly not! Have you forgotten what I said to you in this room before I went out? I mean you to be married, and to go to Australia with your husband and your child. You have not waited as I told you, to hear me explain myself. You have drawn your own conclusions; and you have drawn them wrong. I asked a question just now which you have not answered—I asked if you had forgotten your parlor-maid's duties?"

"Oh no, ma'am!" Louisa had replied rather unwillingly, thus far. She answered readily and confidently now.

"Could you teach the duties to another servant?" asked Magdalen.

"Yes, ma'am—easily, if she was quick and attentive."

"Could you teach the duties to Me?"

Louisa started and changed color. "You, ma'am!" she exclaimed, half in incredulity, half in alarm.

"Yes," said Magdalen. "Could you qualify me to take the parlor-maid's place at St. Crux?"

Plain as those words were, the bewilderment which they produced in Louisa's mind seemed to render her incapable of comprehending her mistress's proposal. "You, ma'am!" she repeated, vacantly.

"I shall perhaps help you to understand this extraordinary project of mine," said Magdalen, "if I tell you what the object of it is. Do you remember what I said to you about Mr. Vanstone's will, when you came here from Scotland to join me?"

"Yes, ma'am. You told me you had been left out of the will altogether. I'm sure my fellow-servant would never have been one of the witnesses if she had known—"

"Never mind that now. I don't blame your fellow-servant—I blame nobody but Mrs. Lecount. Let me go on with what I was saying. It is not at all certain that Mrs. Lecount can do me the mischief which Mrs. Lecount intended. There is a chance that my lawyer, Mr. Loscombe, may be able to gain me what is fairly my due, in spite of the will. The chance turns on my discovering a letter, which Mr. Loscombe believes, and which I believe, to be kept privately in Admiral Bartram's possession. I have not the least hope of getting at that letter if I make the attempt in my own person. Mrs. Lecount has poisoned the admiral's mind against me, and Mr. Vanstone has given him a secret to keep from me. If I wrote to him, he would not answer my letter. If I went to his house, the door would be closed in my face. I must find my way into St. Crux as a stranger—I must be in a position to look about the house unsuspected—I must be there with plenty of time on my hands. All the circumstances are in my favor if I am received into the house as a servant; and as a servant I mean to go."

"But you are a lady, ma'am," objected Louisa, in the greatest perplexity. "The servants at St. Crux would find you out."

"I am not at all afraid of their finding me out," said Magdalen. "I know how to disguise myself in other people's characters more cleverly than you suppose. Leave me to face the chances of discovery—that is my risk. Let us talk of nothing now but what concerns you. Don't decide yet whether you will, or will not, give me the help I want. Wait and hear first what the help is. You are quick and clever at your needle. Can you make me the sort of gown which it is proper for a servant to wear—and can you alter one of my best silk dresses, so as to make it fit yourself, in a week's time?"

"I think I could get them done in a week, ma'am. But why am I to wear— ?"

"Wait a little, and you will see. I shall give the landlady her week's notice to-morrow. In the interval, while you are making the dresses, I can be learning the parlor-maid's duties. When the house-servant here has brought up the dinner, and when you and I are alone in the room—instead of your waiting on me, as usual, I will wait on you. (I am quite serious; don't interrupt me!) Whatever I can learn besides, without hindering you, I will practice carefully at every opportunity. When the week is over, and the dresses are done, we will leave this place, and go into other lodgings—you as the mistress, and I as the maid."

"I should be found out, ma'am," interposed Louisa, trembling at the prospect before her. "I am not a lady."

"And I am," said Magdalen, bitterly. "Shall I tell you what a lady is? A lady is a woman who wears a silk gown, and has a sense of her own importance. I shall put the gown on your back, and the sense in your head. You speak good English—you are naturally quiet and self-restrained—if you can only conquer your timidity I have not the least fear of you. There will be time enough, in the new lodging, for you to practice your character, and for me to practice mine. There will be time enough to make some more dresses—another gown for me, and your wedding-dress (which I mean to give you) for yourself. I shall have the newspaper sent every day. When the advertisement appears I shall answer it—in any name I can take, on the spur of the moment; in your name if you like to lend it to me. When the housekeeper asks me for my character I shall refer her to you. She will see you in the position of mistress, and me in the position of maid—no suspicion can possibly enter her mind unless you put it there. If you only have the courage to follow my instructions, and to say what I tell you to say, the interview will be over in ten minutes."

"You frighten me, ma'am," said Louisa, still trembling. "You take my breath away with surprise. Courage! Where shall I find courage?"

"Where I keep it for you," said Magdalen—"in the passage-money to Australia. Look at the new prospect which gives you a husband and restores you to your child, and you will find your courage there."

Louisa's sad face brightened; Louisa's faint heart beat quick. A spark of her mistress's spirit flew up into her eyes as she thought of the golden future.

"If you accept my proposal," pursued Magdalen, "you can be asked in church at once, if you like. I promise you the money on the day when the advertisement appears in the newspaper. The risk of the housekeeper's rejecting me is my risk—not yours. My good looks are sadly gone off, I know. But I think I can still hold my place against the other servants—I think I can still look the parlor-maid whom Admiral Bartram wants. There is nothing for you to fear in this matter; I should not have mentioned it if there had been. The only danger is the danger of my being discovered at St. Crux, and that falls entirely on me. By the time I am in the admiral's house you will be married, and the ship will be taking you to your new life."

Louisa's face, now brightening with hope, now clouding again with fear, showed plain signs of the struggle which it cost her to decide. She tried to gain time; she attempted confusedly to speak a few words of gratitude; but her mistress silenced her.

"You owe me no thanks," said Magdalen. "I tell you again we are only helping each other. I have very little money, but it is enough for your purpose, and I give it you freely. I have led a wretched life; I have made others wretched about me. I can't even make you happy, except by tempting you to a new deceit. There! there! it's not your fault. Worse women than you are will help me if you refuse. Decide as you like, but don't be afraid of taking the money. If I succeed I shall not want it. If I fail—"

She stopped, rose abruptly from her chair, and hid her face from Louisa by walking away to the fire-place.

"If I fail," she resumed, warming her foot carelessly at the fender, "all the money in the world will be of no use to me. Never mind why—never mind Me—think of yourself. I won't take advantage of the confession you have made to me; I won't influence you against your will. Do as you yourself think best. But remember one thing—my mind is made up: nothing you can say or do will change it."

Her sudden removal from the table, the altered tones of her voice as she spoke the last words, appeared to renew Louisa's hesitation. She clasped her hands together in her lap, and wrung them hard. "This has come on me very suddenly, ma'am," said the girl. "I am sorely tempted to say Yes; and yet I'm almost afraid—"

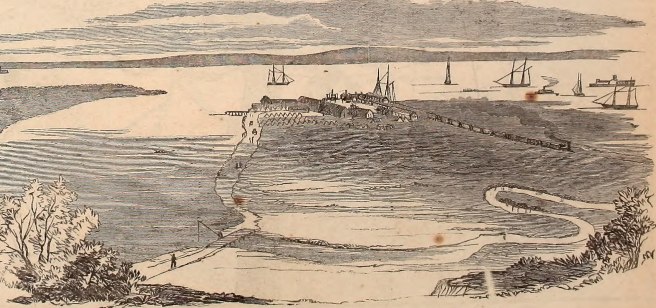
"Take the night to consider it," interposed Magdalen, keeping her face persistently turned toward the fire, "and tell me what you have decided to do when you come into my room to-morrow morning. I shall want no help to-night; I can undress myself. You are not so strong as I am; you are tired, I dare say. Don't sit up on my account. Good-night, Louisa, and pleasant dreams!"

Her voice sank lower and lower as she spoke those kind words. She sighed heavily; and, leaning her arm on the mantle-piece, laid her head on it with a reckless weariness miserable to see. Louisa had not left the room, as she supposed; Louisa came softly to her side and kissed her hand. Magdalen started; but she made no attempt this time to draw her hand away. The sense of her own horrible isolation subdued her at the touch of the servant's lips. Her proud heart melted; her eyes filled with burning tears. "Don't distress me!" she said, faintly. "The time for kindness has gone by; it only overpowers me now. Good-night!"

The morning came; and the affirmative answer which Magdalen had anticipated was the answer given. On that day the landlady received her week's notice to quit, and Louisa's needle flew fast through the stitches of the parlor-maid's dress.

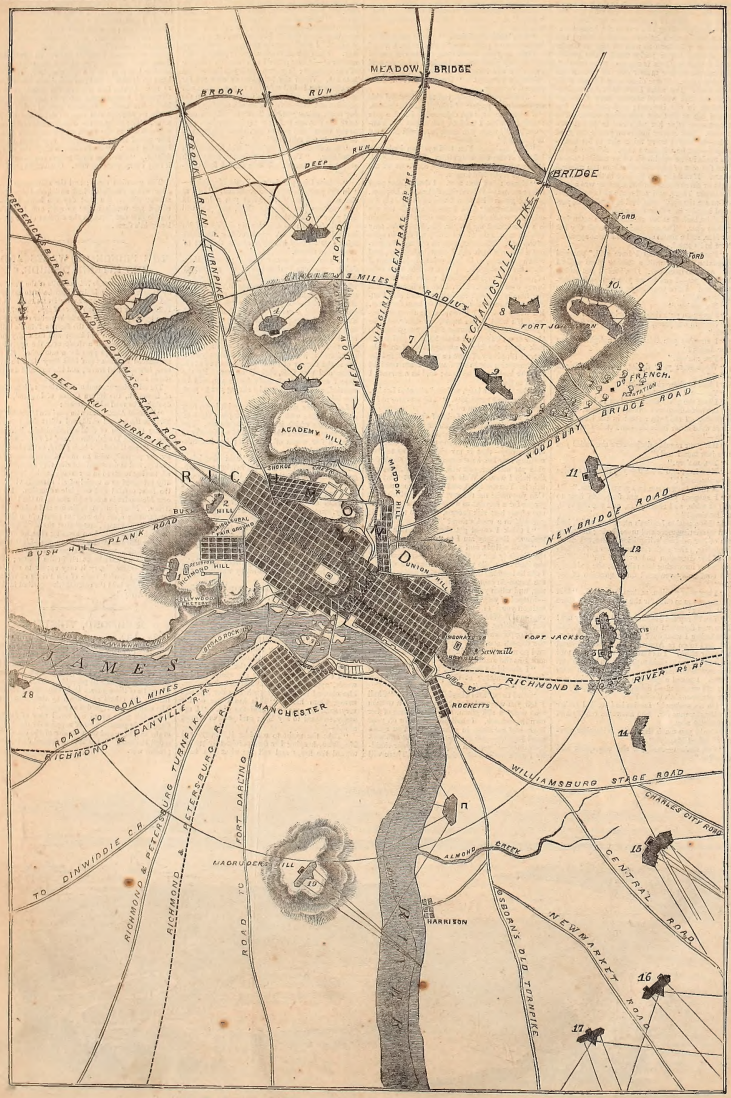
THE PRINCE OF WALES AND HIS INTENDED BRIDE.

WE publish on page 781 portraits of the PRINCE OF WALES and the Lady whom he is to marry, the PRINCESS ALEXANDRA OF DENMARK. The Prince is just twenty-one years of age. It will be seen by our portrait that he looks rather older than when he danced here at the famous Prince's ball. He wears incipient whiskers; and the crafty engraver has contrived a shade over the upper lip which may perhaps pass for a mustache. He is understood to have been kept busy since he left here, in study and travel, and has no doubt a well-stored mind.



The following account of the Princess Alexandra of Denmark, the future Queen of England, will doubtless be read with interest:

"Princess Alexandra, (who was born December 1, 1844, is the second child and eldest daughter of Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, heir-expectant to the Danish throne, and of Princess Louisa of Hesse-Cassel. She is gifted, as will be seen by our portrait, with no inconsiderable share of beauty, and is described as being very accomplished, having received in her family, which is generally esteemed as a model of all domestic virtues, the most careful and complete education. Princess Alexandra is a Sous-Lieutenant in the Danish Army. Many journals in France and Belgium, in commenting upon the account given of the Royal family of Denmark, stated that the Almanach de Gotha had committed an amusing mistake in describing Princess Alexandra as a Sous-Lieutenant in the Danish Army. It appears, however, that there was no mistake at all in the matter; for, however extraordinary it may appear to us, the illustrious intended bride of the Prince of Wales does actually hold the commission described in the Danish Army."



RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

WE publish on page 780 a chart of THE CITY OF RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, AND ITS ENVIRONS, showing the fortifications which have been erected for its defense by the rebels. In the course of a day or two, Burnside, and perhaps some one else, from another side, will probably be thundering at the walls of these forts. Only two of the forts are named, the others are known by their numbers. The map may be regarded as accurate.

On this page we give a small view of AQUIA CREEK, the present base of supplies for the Army of the Potomac, and the terminus of the old Richmond Railroad. It has become famous during the present war.

THANKSGIVING.

"WHAT have soldiers in hospital, writhing in pain, or tossing in fever, to be thankful for? The day is a humbug. Keep it? No, I've not kept it."

A strong man shorn of his strength spoke, but it was no Delilah answering.

"Many a poor soldier weary with pain and agony has found cause for thankfulness; some trifling deed of pity or word of sympathy has stirred his heart to gratefulness. Suffering generally humbles men to recognize and accept what they disdain in the pride and glory of health."

"Yes, you women get us in your power and then crow."

"Victor, what malice!"

"It is true; then tell us to be thankful. For what? for maimed, crippled bodies, for useless arms, for paralytic legs?"

The pale face grew paler, and a scornful smile gleamed out of restless, eager eyes.

"Oh, Victor! Victor! the battle is but half fought, the glory only half won when you utter these thoughts."

Victor partially raised himself, leaning on one arm and speaking haughtily.

"If you think I implied regret at giving my mite to this war you are wholly mistaken, Margaret."

"No, no! I did not mean that, believe me; but it is right for all to be thankful, and I meant you had not gained one of the direct purposes of suffering."

"Pray what is that?"

Margaret's head drooped as she answered,

"Gratitude for having shared in even the least degree that which was endured for us all by our Master."

Victor's voice had lowered before he replied,

"I am no Carmelite, Margaret, nor one of those who believe that mere bodily pain can make us like the Divine One."

"But it can help—it can indeed."

She was so afraid to speak of these things that she dared not say all she was thinking. She wanted to assure him that a better appreciation of the great sacrifice lay in his power than in hers, rejoicing as she was in health and vigor; but different leaven had been working in his mind, for he suddenly resumed again in his cutting, ironical tone:

"Ah, it is easy to preach of thankfulness in purple and fine linen to the ragged, beggarly horde! You have heard the sermon to-day, you have given thanks devoutly, and now—stand a little farther off that I may look at you—you are going to the sumptuous dinner; but you do not care for the viands, your esthetic palate is to be cajoled. I wonder who will whisper the most tasteful, delicate flatteries; who will offer the most poetic draughts, spiced carefully for such dainty lips! Let me see. The sheen of your silk dazzles—I must shade my weak vision—it is very beautiful; and the lace at your throat, how soft and downy—you call it a ruche, I believe; the rose, too, in your hair is red, rosier than your fair face, red as the blood I have seen on battle-fields—"

"Madge! Madge! where are you? Come out of this dungeon. We are waiting for you. What are you two crooning over? Victor, you look as sour as green grapes. Look at me; am I not bewitching? See, I am en militaire."

The fairiest little being, robed in pink tarlatan, danced in and thrust her curly pate down on her brother's arm, chattering all the while.

"You have kept Madge ever so long; isn't she a darling?"

"What is that she wears on her necklace, Josey?"

"A cross, a pearl cross; Madge, let him see it!"

"Don't ask her, Josey. She is angry with me. Is that the way you women wear crosses made of pearls and hung on a golden chain? How heavy they must be!"

"Stop, Victor, stop, you are outrageous. Madge has gone, and I shall go too; but look at the buttons in my ears."

"Petite sauvage! why make holes in such little pink sea-shells of auriculas?"

"I don't know what you mean. I wear army button ear-rings to match this army button bracelet, and they are lovely. But, Vic, I wish you had your dear old leg again so we could have a redowa —and how splendidly you used to lead the German! Oh, it is too bad! I shall just cry."

"And make your eyes red. Oh no, Josey; come, dance off with yourself. Who's to be there?"

"Every body."

"Tell me who Margaret dances with."

"She won't dance in war times, she says. Isn't she old fogy? She came up to me the other night and said the music ought to be funeral marches instead of giddy waltzes."

"Was that after I came home?"

"No, before; and you know how magnificently she plays. Well, she would not touch the piano except to give us the adagio of one of Beethoven's symphonies, or something else so sad that we could hardly keep from tears; but I must go, Vic. Good-by; don't get blue here all alone. I suppose you would rather have a book than my delectable society?"

"Oh yes, chatter-box; adieu!"

The light steps danced down the hall; other steps and other voices echoed, died away; the carriage wheels rolled off, and silence reigned.

Victor took up his book: the print was too fine: so he was obliged to relinquish it, wishing he had some one to read aloud to him. Margaret had so often read to him that the words began to bear more clearness and power from her voice than any other, but he had provoked her now. It was not a pleasant reverie in which he was indulging; alone, crippled, feverish, restless; he who had prided himself on his independence and manly strength. But he did not regret having spoken as he did to Margaret; it rather satisfied him to resent kindness and patience with cool sarcasm; it was his masculine protest against forbearance and gentleness. "Thankful, grateful—I have no need, I wish to have no need for such words. Has she not left me all alone here to gnash my teeth at fate, to ponder over my uselessness and miserable good-for-nothingness, while she dances off to a dinner—a Thanksgiving dinner? And why should she not go? What does she owe me that she should deny herself any pleasure? Nothing. To be sure I once told her—I was fool enough then—that no other woman in the world had so great a sway over my actions; confound it! She has tightened the rein till the bit cuts at every pull; but I am revenging myself. I hurt her nicely to-night. She's a good little Christian, and does not like to be thought a Pharisee."

A little table stood near with convenient trifles. A book of larger type caught his eye, Mrs. Browning's "Last Poems." It opened of itself, as if it knew the hand accustomed to hold it (not Victor's), at the hundred and seventy-eighth page. Down the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth verses was scored lightly a pencil mark. For one vivid moment he knew what one woman had suffered in all the dreary time of his silent imprisonment in Richmond, and like an avenging weapon those verses cut in deeply. He tried to shake it off; he tried to think some other hand had opened these pages so often that the leaves fell apart at this one place. He knew better; and knowing it, self-reproach added to his dreariness. His bell rang so furiously that the servant feared some accident and rushed breathlessly in.

"Did the ladies say when they would return, Joanna?"

"No, Sir; but not until late I'm sure, Sir."

"Ask them when they come—no, you need not either. Bring me a glass of water."

"Yes, Sir."

He was very restless and feverish, and lay with closed eyes as quick steps indicated Joanna's return. But the step was lighter, and a cool hand laid softly on his brow made him start.

A quiet figure in gray merino, with only a blue bow knotted under the linen collar, stood near him —thick, drooping, wavy curls hid her eyes.

"I thought you had gone!" was the half-impatient exclamation.

"I changed my mind at the last moment."

"To heap coals of fire on my head, I suppose."

"Victor, drink this water; you have fever; don't talk."

"I must."

"Not now; let me read." She had opened a book, and crouched down on a low ottoman, her face shaded by her hand, began to read. The voice was like a chime of low, sweet bells, but they seemed to jangle in Victor's ears. He tossed and turned, and finally put out his hand and grasped the book.

"Pardon me, Margaret."

"Shall I go away, Victor?"

"Yes."

There was not a tinge of sentiment or sadness in her words, but they were very calm and low.

"I only came because I saw you were worse and needed recreation," rising as she spoke.

"Do you call this recreation?"

"No, it is very evident I have done harm."

"More than you can repair, Margaret."

He was not now speaking satirically, and she looked at him with amazement.

"You have made me break a resolution so strong that it was nearly a vow."

"I, Victor?"

"Yes, you, with your calmness and womanly gentleness, your terrible malignity."

She knew not what he meant; and though she had determined not to be weak, tears would come; just one passionate outburst, which she quelled proudly the moment they were shed. But he saw them, and drew her toward his couch.

"This is the way I have to sue for pardon, lying helpless, maimed for life. I had rather you had killed me, Margaret, than force me so to love you that I can not longer hide it. Oh, Margaret, Margaret, it was cruel! I, who shall never ask any woman to be my wife."

Margaret put out her hand very coolly.

"Good-night, Victor."

"Must you go? Then I am mistaken. I hoped you cared for me, Margaret, in spite of my detestable behavior."

"Yes, I must go, Victor."

"It has been very tiresome for you here, Margaret, listening to my folly."

"No, I did not care to go out."

Her perfect indifference at last enraged him, as she knew it would.

"You seem to be in no way moved at my misery. I did not know you were so cold and heartless."

"What would you have me say?"

"Drop some delicious grains of pity; sweeten the bitter pill with honeyed phrases."

"I am very sorry this has happened."

"But that is a cant expression. You are generally original."

She was silent again, and moved toward the door. He detained her, grasping her passive hand.

"Among all your thanks to-day can you spare a little forgiveness?"

"For what?"

"For my rudeness and harshness." His voice was gentle again.

"There is more to forgive than that."

"I dare say; but I am in earnest. Don't go yet. Do you forgive me?"

"No!"—firmly, softly, but emphatically.

"And why not? Is my sin so heinous?"

"The man is not a brave one who tells a woman he loves her but will not ask her to be his wife."

"Margaret!"

She went on as indifferently and coolly as if discussing some novel.

"It is not brave, nor is it honest, for he may have won her love in some strange way."

"But she should let him know," said Victor, half amazed and half amused.

"A true woman's self-respect is a barrier to that."

Victor bit his lip.

"A cripple, doomed to drag a footless stump after him all his life, has no right to ask a young and beautiful, no, nor an old and ugly, woman to be his wife."

"Who has laid down that law?"

"A true man's self-respect is the barrier."

Margaret glanced up, a very sunbeam of a smile playing over her features.

"It is a dead-lock, Victor."

"It shall not be, Margaret, if you will just stoop down here a moment."

"What for?"

"Now I have both your hands; tell me, do you, dare you love me?"

There was no answer, and her curls drooped over her face. He repeated the question, but she would not reply.

For a moment or two his pale face worked. It was hard for him to make the attempt he had almost sworn not to do—so hard, that for a moment he faltered.

But the temptation was irresistible, and he saw that nothing else would compel Margaret to answer, so he spoke:

"Margaret, will you be my wife?"

"Yes, Victor," came the answer, clearly spoken.

"The wife of a cripple?"

She crushed the words with a kiss.

For a long while there was stillness, Victor clasping tightly Margaret's hands as if afraid she would elude them, but in place of the pain and feverish irritability on his features was a look of very expressive content.

Margaret's tears were so nearly falling that it was some time before she could ask Victor what he was thinking of, so unusual was his silence.

"Keeping my Thanksgiving at last," was the reply.

A TRIBUTE.

How sleep the brave? Oh! not as cowards sleep,
Whose hands no labor bore;
Over their graves no loving one shall weep—
They shall be named no more.
No ringing voice above the tomb shall break,
Proclaiming truth more boldly for their sake.

Not so they sleep who for their country die—
On their name rests no blot;
Through the world's changes, as the years roll by,
They never are forgot.
Earth's greatest soul may know no greater pride
Than to be called to die as they have died.

When Freedom's sons assemble to relate
The deeds that they have done,
Each telling of some victory, made more great
Being so nobly won;
There RICHARDSON and MITCHELL shall be seen—
One bronzed and scarred, with a true soldier's mien;

The other, with his calm and steady eyes
Turned upward to the stars,
Seeking new inspiration from the skies,
'Neath the red planet Mars.
Upon the roll of fame their names are traced
In golden letters, ne'er to be effaced!

MAJOR-GENERAL BANKS.

ON page 769 we give a portrait of NATHANIEL P. BANKS, Major-General in the Army of the United States, and commander of the Great Southern Expedition which is now on its way to its destination. Our likeness is from a photograph by Brady.

General Banks was born at Waltham, Massachusetts, on 30th January, 1816. His parents were poor operatives who worked in the mills; young Nathaniel went barefoot to the common school, and there obtained all the education he ever enjoyed as a lad. He was soon called upon to take his place in a factory to earn his living, and for several years he worked regularly with the other operatives. Simultaneously he assisted in the establishment of a debating society, and contributed to the columns of the local paper. He subsequently became editor of this paper, and in 1842 was brought forward as Democratic candidate for Assembly from Waltham. He was defeated. He ran again in 1843, and in each of the following four years, with equal non-success. At length, in 1848, just as he was thinking of seeking fortune in California, he was elected, and remained a member of the Massachusetts Legislature until he was sent to Congress, voting and acting with the Democratic party. In 1850 he was chosen Speaker of the House; and in 1852 was sent to Congress, and became Speaker of that body too, after one of the most memorable contests in our Congressional history. As Speaker of the House Mr. Banks won high fame by his Parliamentary skill, firmness, and fairness. It was well said of him, at the close of his term, by a political opponent, that he "stood so straight that he almost leaned over to the other side."

At the close of Mr. Banks's term in Congress he withdrew from public life, and after spending some time in retirement at Waltham, accepted the post of Superintendent of the Illinois Central Railway, which had just been vacated by General M'Clellan. He was discharging the duties of this post when the rebellion broke out. It found him neither unprepared nor astonished. He went to Washington in February, 1861; foretold the secession of Virginia and the outbreak of the civil war, and created quite a commotion in the ranks of those who pinned their faith to Mr. Seward's honeyed phrases and rose-color visions. When war actually broke out, and troops were called for, Mr. Banks was at once designated by the public voice for a military command, and he was accordingly appointed Major-General by the President. With his usual foresight he had been studying strategy for some time, and when he took the field was thoroughly competent to command. He was given a division of the Army of the Potomac, and set to watch the upper fords of the river. Many months were spent in training his army. At length, early in 1862, he crossed the river and advanced up the Shenandoah Valley. He was driving Jackson before him, and doing his work well and faithfully, when the War Department began to withdraw his troops. First a brigade, then a regiment, then a whole division were ordered to the defense of posts which were supposed to be in danger; so that at last General Banks was left with only about 4000 men, while Jackson lay opposite him with 15,000. The circumstance soon became known to the wily rebel, and the attack on Front Royal followed. Banks's retreat to the north side of the Potomac, without the loss of a gun and with a very small loss in men, is rightly accounted one of the most brilliant military operations of the war. Jackson's disappointment at the escape of the prey he already deemed secured was severe. It was on the occasion of this retreat that the incident of the little slave girl, whom Banks carried out of Virginia "on the national cannon," took place: nothing in his career has made him more popular than this.

When M'Clellan commenced his retreat from the Peninsula, Banks was ordered forward to the Rappahannock under Pope. He fought the battle of Cedar Mountain with very inferior forces to the enemy, and with Sigel's aid held him in check until M'Clellan had retreated safely to Yorktown. He did not take part in the battles of Centreville or Bull Run the second: wounded at the Rappahannock, he was doing duty at Washington as military commander.

General Banks has now been appointed to the command of a Great Southern Expedition, part of which has already sailed. That he will be heard from in a manner which will rejoice the Northern heart no one who knows his lucky star can doubt.

THE "PASSAIC" AND HER TURRET.

THE turret of the Passaic is unquestionably the greatest engineering achievement of the time. The successful operation of this structure with its monster guns marks an era in the history of naval warfare.

Our engraving on page 773 represents the turret cut in two, through the vertical plane, the nearest half supposed to be removed in order to afford a full view of the interior. The enormous guns, Dahlgren's 15-inch, each weighing 42,000 pounds, are seen in perspective resting on light elegant carriages made of wrought iron. By means of very simple mechanism within the carriages, the constructor enables three men of moderate strength to handle these ponderous pieces with great facility. To the left of the muzzle of the nearest gun will be seen the port stopper, a bent block of wrought iron supported by a pivot, on which it turns so readily that one man can bring its broad face before the port-hole in less than five seconds, thereby effectually shutting out the enemy's projectiles.

The enormous balls, of 425 pounds weight, will be seen conveniently arranged within curved guides round the base of the turret, a broad jointed ring for handling these terrific projectiles being also represented.

Our readers can form a good idea of the size of the guns, 4 feet diameter, by comparison with the gunners standing on the left. The turret, composed of plate iron, is 23 feet outside diameter, 9 feet high, 11 inches thick, the entire weight being 240 tons. It might be supposed that such a ponderous mass could only be turned round by being placed on friction rollers; yet this expedient has not been resorted to. The constructor, deeming such complication incompatible with the solidity necessary to withstand the shocks of modern projectiles, boldly places the turret with its smooth lower edge on a broad ring in the deck, and trusts to his powerful mechanism within to cause the stupendous mass to rotate on its base. The gunner, placed behind the breech when the gun is to be aimed, simply raises or depresses a light handle and the gun instantly moves in the direction he wishes. The exact point being attained, a retrograde half-movement of the handle at once arrests the rotation of the turret and leaves the gun directed to the desired object.

But the result of Captain Ericsson's bold conception does not stop here. A still greater triumph has attended his labors. Our readers will observe on the engraving that the port-hole of the turret is far less in width than the diameter of the muzzle of the gun, and that, consequently, the gun must be fired within the turret. The proposition to discharge the largest cannon afloat within the narrow space of this cylindrical iron chamber without putting the muzzle through—not even into the port-hole—is so startling that nothing short of positive practical demonstration could prove its soundness. It is a flattering comment on the judgment of Admiral Gregory, and the other naval officers superintending the construction of our iron-clads, that they did not oppose, but on the contrary warmly seconded, Captain Ericsson's plan. The result of two careful trials, the second and final one made on the 15th, has realized every expectation. The smoke is effectually kept out, and the noise from the discharge of the monster guns within the turret is less than that of an ordinary field-piece.

Captain Ericsson, to whose genius the country is indebted for this master-piece, has been so kind as to inspect our artist's picture, and writes us that it is very accurate.

The engraving on page 772 represents the Passaic as she will appear at sea, and needs no description.

FREDERICKSBURG, VIRGINIA.

WE devote pages 776 and 777 to illustrations of FREDERICKSBURG, which is at present the centre of interest in Virginia. Our pictures, with one exception, are from sketches by Mr. H. Didiot, of the Sixth Wisconsin Volunteers. The exception is the picture of the Broken Bridge, which is from a sketch by our old correspondent, Adjutant Cope.

The following description of the place was published in Harper's Weekly some time since:

Fredericksburg is the chief town of Spottsylvania County, in Virginia, and is situated on the right bank of the Rappahannock River, at the head of tide-water. It is between fifty and sixty miles from Richmond by railroad, and sixty-five miles by the turnpike, in a northerly direction. Turnpike roads connect it with Falmouth and Newport—the former by a ferry across the Rappahannock—and another turnpike leads through a wilderness to Orange Court House, where a railroad connects it with Gordonsville. The town itself is pleasantly situated in a fertile valley, and has great advantages for commerce and manufactures. The railroad from Washington, the Aquia Creek, passed through it, and thereby a large traffic and travel was maintained. The Potomac River, at Aquia Landing, is easily reached by the railroad. Steamboats through in an hour on each trip, a not inconsiderable advantage was created thereby in the immediate vicinity of the town. It is distant from Aquia Creek by railroad about fifteen miles, from which point part of the Potomac River may be used to be carried to Fredericksburg. A good canal has also been constructed from the town to a point on the Rappahannock River, about forty miles above, by which large quantities of iron, grain, and lumber were received for exportation. The river afforded extensive water power, which, however, was not used, for the want, also in the neighborhood, varying in height from forty to one hundred feet, abound in fine granite and freestone. Some thirty years since the prospect of Fredericksburg being a rapidly rising town was great, but lack of enterprise, of public prosperity, and after, as it were, standing still for about twenty years. It gradually retrograded in its importance. In 1840 its population numbered nearly four thousand souls; and in 1850, ten years later, it had only increased eighty-eight persons—less than nine each year, and being now, in 1860, but a little over five thousand souls in existence. Before the rebellion it contained five churches, one orphan asylum, two academies, four common schools, and two banks.—ED.

Fredericksburg has changed hands more than once. While the Potomac blockade lasted it was a chief depôt for rebel supplies. When M'Clellan advanced to Yorktown it was evacuated, and was occupied by M'Dowell. After the battles of the seven days before Richmond M'Dowell fell back, and the rebels again seized it. Burnside coming up the Potomac to the aid of Pope, in August, occupied it for a few days; when he marched down to Warrenton it again fell back under the stars and bars. The reader will find an account of its more recent fortunes in the news column.

Extract of Letter from VICTOR HUGO TO MR. WRAXALL.

"From the moment when M. Lacaille is your friend, as he is mine, you can not fail to produce an excellent work, leaving for guide and consultant that great and noble mind. (Signed) VICTOR HUGO."

JOHN PEETER, the ablest critic in England, the Literary Editor of the London Examiner, on speaking of the AUTHORIZED TRANSLATION, by WRAXALL and Lacaille, says:

"On the publication of this celebrated Novel, in the original form, we entered very minutely into the story. It only now remains for us to say that WE CAN CONSCIENTIOUSLY RECOMMEND IT TO THE PUBLIC AS A PERFECTLY FAITHFUL VERSION.—Nothing of importance between the language salable of, all the spirit and the point of the original. IN ITS PRESENT FORM, 'Les Miserables' stands a very fair chance of having as wide a sale as the French Original."

The Authorized Edition,

Complete in One Volume, with Portrait of the Author, elegantly bound, is published for ONE DOLLAR in Paper; or, ONE DOLLAR AND A HALF, in Muslin. NOW READY, and all orders filled from this day without delay.

Facts about Brandreth's Pills.

NEWCASTLE, WESTCHESTER CO., N. Y., Oct. 25, 1852.

MR. G. TEN EYCK BRINKERHOFF, Rhine Stay Hospitalizer:

DEAR SIR,—I would state that I was induced to use BRANDRETH'S PILLS through the recommendation of John R. Swift, of Trenton, Westchester County, who was entirely restored to health by their use. He was for many years very, very restive and dyspeptic, and he tried everything, but was not relieved. Finally, he took one Brandreth's Pill every day for a week, and then two Pills every day for three days, and then took one Pill every day, with occasional doses of air. In one month he was able to go to work, and in three months he was gaining 40 pounds in weight.

Yours truly, EDWARD PUDDY.

WESTCHESTER COUNTY, ss.

Edward Puddy being duly sworn, says that he resides in the town of Newcastle; that some years ago he was very sick with a sore on his leg, which had been running for over five years; had to use a stick constantly for a pain in his chest, and besides was very restive and dyspeptic; that after trying various remedies in the course of a year, he commenced using Brandreth's Pills, six to eight times times a week, and at the end of one month the sore on his leg healed, and at the end of two months he was entirely cured of restiveness, dyspepsia, and pain, and has remained well ever since. EDWARD PUDDY.

Sworn to before me, this 25th day of October, 1852.

A MANUAL OF MECHANICS IN SUBJECT LESSONS, adapted to the use of the School and Family Charts, and object Lessons in Drawing. By CHARLES WILLIAM LEEDS, Chith, $1 00.

The Rochester City Public Schools and Wilson's Readers.

A little more than two years ago Wilson's Readers were introduced into the Public Schools of the City of Rochester, on one half of the retail prices for the first supply. Since then contract but unsuccessful efforts on the part of those outside of the Schools have been made to displace them, even by the offer of other books in free exchange for Wilson's. The unanimous testimony of the teachers who are regarded by those to whom the citizens of Rochester have intrusted the guardianship of their schools:

From DANIEL HOLBROOK, Esq., Superintendent of the Public Schools of Rochester, N. Y., Oct. 14, 1862.

At the last meeting of our Board of Education, Committees were appointed to examine Wilson's and Watson's Readers to adopted as text-books in place of the Willard Readers. The Committee have to furnished a report to the pupils in the several schools," which resolution was laid on the table for one month. The pupils were instructed, no one here having heard a word of it, save the owner. The Report was made by the Committee on Readers, and we got up entirely by somebody in New York. I am decidedly in favor of Wilson's Readers, and the Board have seen as to say better than Watson's. Wilson's, but better than any others that I have seen. I have had a considerable time in this report I give them, and am in for the good of our schools.

From WILLIAM ARTHUR, Chairman of the Committee on Text-books of the Public Schools of Rochester, N. Y., Oct. 31, 1862.

I was not present when the resolution to displace Wilson's Readers was introduced, and under if I had been I should have opposed it; for I am satisfied, both from my own observation and that of the opinion of teachers, of the merits of Wilson's Readers. I have conversed with the Rev. Superintendent, Mr. Holbrook, and found him of the fully concur with me. I shall oppose any attempt to displace them. Yours truly,

From F. H. MARSHALL, Esq., President of the Board of Education, Rochester, Oct. 31, 1862.

I do not think the Board of Education will make any changes in Readers. The Principals of Schools are perfectly satisfied with Wilson's Series, now in use. I think there is an unanimous effort of some interested persons, but I do not think it will succeed. I am not in favor of changing books without some strong reason, unless there is a superior to those in use.

At the late November meeting of the Board the resolution above referred to was not called up for consideration, and the Board voted that pointed upon the list. Indeed members of the Board were opposed to any change of Readers.

Elegant Colored

CARTES DE VISITE.

Newton's Prepared Colors for Albumen Pictures.

This new preparation for painting the Card Photograph may be used by any person of taste, though not an Artist, with great expedition and remarkable effect.

The colors are fluid, in bottles, into a neat black-walnut box, and the directions for use accompany each box.

Pictures painted with them look as if done in the process of taking, the surface not being in the least affected, as with the common water colors.

For the amateur, as well as the artist, they are invaluable; a few moments suffice to produce a most elegant and finished picture.

Price per box $3 00, and with a large bottle of reducing liquid $4 25.

☞ The remarkable success attending these colors has already induced some dishonest person to offer, in a similar style and shape, a spurious imitation. See that the name of the sole Agents for the United States, J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, is affixed to the box.

Fifty Dollars will be paid for the conviction of any person selling the spurious imitation for "NEWTON'S ARTISTIC COLORS."

A packet of beautiful Natural Flowers, Fancy Pictures, Portraits of Distinguished Persons for coloring will be sent by mail for 25 cents each.

THANKSGIVING.

I THINK of you all, dear Mother,
Ned, and Emma, and Moll,
Dark-eyed Harry, and little Lou,
Jim, and Bessie, and all!
How often we've met together
For many a bright year past,
Till it seemed to me as if every one
Was merrier than the last.

I greet you all, though so far away
That your faces I can not see;
I remember each, with a sacred joy—
Do you also remember me?
Looking up to the dear old flag
With loyal hearts and true,
Do you smile to think for freedom's sake
I am absent to-day from you?

Yes, I know who name me every day
When they kneel to God in prayer—
I know who watch every paper through
To see if my name be there.
And now in this good Thanksgiving time,
When the land hums rings with glee,
There will be one toast to "Our absent ones,"
And then you will think of me!

Yon always called me "wild," you know,
Wondered what would be my fate—
"So giddy and mischievous, what will he do
When he reaches man's estate?"
Well, here I am, twenty-one last month,
And my holiday life is through:
I face death calmly day by day—
How strange it must seem to you!

As I sit in my tent by this moonlight
I hear your voices fall,
Like distant music, upon my ear,
And your names I softly call.
How long before we shall meet again
In the homestead far away?
No matter, we yet live—and God is good,
And this is Thanksgiving day!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1862.

THE MESSAGE.

THERE are just four points of interest in the Message. The allusion to the subject of reference to emancipation, the sketch of a financial policy, and the review of our foreign relations. Outside of these, all is mere routine.

1. The War.—Persons who take up the Message in the hope of finding in it some retrospect of the past operations of the war, and some estimation of what is to happen hereafter, will meet with disappointment. Were it not for the brief paragraph at the commencement of the Message, that document would contain no reference whatever to the one thing vital in the nation in which we live. And that one paragraph is characteristic. The President says: "While it is not pleased the Almighty to bless us with the return of peace, no one has any pretense to complain, but every one has reason to be grateful, guided by the best light He gives us, trusting that, in His own good time and wise way, all will be well." One can not help recalling the old Middle-Age story of the mailed crusader who, in a fit of the spleen, fell to beating his "people" with a stout quarter-staff. His wife, touched by the groans of the sufferers and the astonishing length of the punishment, called from her tower to ask her lord how long he intended to trounce those poor creatures? "Ma mie!" replied the devout Baron, "tout cet à plaire a Dieu!" (As long as God pleased, my dear.)

2. Emancipating.—This subject is very fully discussed in the Message. The President alludes to the principle previously enunciated by him, viz.: that slavery was the cause of the war, and that the extirpation of slavery ends it. But he departs from the policy which he recommended to Congress last session, inasmuch as he now proposes an amendment to the Constitution, tendering compensation to all States which shall abolish slavery before the year 1900. The resolution which he laid before Congress nearly a year ago, and which passed both Houses by large majorities, tendered aid to States abolishing slavery without specifying the time at which abolition should take place. It was the hope and expectation of the President and of his friends in Congress that four States, Maryland, Delaware, Kentucky, and Missouri, would accept this offer and proceed to the abolition of slavery at once. That hope has not been realized. It is doubtful whether the people of any of these four States are any nearer voluntary abolition than they were twelve months ago, though their property in slaves has been so vastly diminished by the war. The President, however, is not discouraged. He now proposes to embody the offer of compensation in the Constitution, in order to render it more solemn and binding, and to make it a standing offer for the next thirty-seven years. Whether this compromise measure, wise as it may prove eventually, will at present satisfy either the partisans of slavery at the South or its opponents at the North remains to be seen.

The President distinctly states that this scheme of compensated emancipation is not intended to supersede the proclamation of September 22d freeing the slaves in the rebel States. By that proclamation, every slave dwelling in a locality which has not elected members of Congress by a majority of legally constituted voters shall be free on 1st January next, and shall be entitled to claim that the United States shall protect him in the enjoyment of his freedom. If this proclamation stands unrecalled, the slaves now held in nineteen-fifths of Virginia, North Carolina, and Louisiana, two-thirds of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, and Arkansas, and three-fourths of Tennessee, will be freemen in lay of now in fact, in the course of a month from this time. So far as we can perceive no amendment to the Constitution will be required to secure their political status; and the operation of the proposed amendment will consequently be confined to the slaves in Maryland, Delaware, Missouri, Kentucky, and such parts of Louisiana, Tennessee, Virginia, and the other rebel States as are held by the armed forces of the United States.

The President renews his favorite recommendation to Congress that provision be made for the expatriation of emancipated slaves. With that candor which is his most amiable characteristic, however, he admits that the efforts which have been discovered in the way of the accomplishment of this project. In the first place, no State in America, or, indeed, no country populated slaves as citizens. Hayti, in San Domingo, and Liberia, in Africa, alone tender to them the right to citizenship. And the unfortunate about these places is that the negroes won't go there. Indeed, the President admits this, as a rule, the free negroes object to be exiled at all! He has endeavored, by argument and persuasion, to convince them that it is to their best interest to go to a land of their own that they may come to see the matter in this light by-and-by. Thus far, however, these persons will, probably, with no unreasonable fear, entertain a fondness for their native country, which bears a remarkable resemblance to a sentiment commonly entertained by persons with white skins, called by poets "patriotism."

3. The Finances.—On this very important subject the President gives us little information. He is anxious to see our finances placed on a specie basis. He doubts whether it be wise to issue as many legal tender notes as the country can absorb. He suggests a national bank system, as though they would necessarily be negotiated by-and-by. And he concludes that, on the whole, the best method of meeting the cost of the war is by the establishment of banks of issue, whose issue shall be uniform in appearance and shall secure the deposit in the Treasury Department of United States Bonds. He supplies us with no information as to the number of banks that will probably be established, or the amount of bonds which they will take, or the sum of money which they will yield to the Treasury. We must wait for Mr. Chase's report to obtain light on these important points.

4. Our Foreign Relations.—The President diplomatically observes that "in the unsettled state of the foreign world, though less gratifying than usual, are more satisfactory than might have been expected." Which statement is quite true. Foreign nations have taken advantage of our embarrassments to seek causes of quarrel with us, and have thus far successfully resisted the many reclamations and disputes. Claims against us have been made by Great Britain, France, Russia, and Spain; but these claims have been disposed to refer to a mixed Convention. The offer has not yet been accepted, but the President seems to expect that it will be, and that matters of things is obviously incidental to a state of war, and it would be unwise if it were just to complain of it.

The tone of the Message is manly and truthful. Perhaps it might have been more hopeful; but the people of the North have every encouragement in the task they have undertaken. They know the magnitude of the business; and, without wasting time in words, are resolved to go through with it to the bitter end.

THE LOUNGER.

A LETTER TO A HESITATING FRIEND.

MY DEAR JOHN.—You write that you are by nature a peaceful man, and cherish the hope that faith has latterly acquired among us a suspicious face, and that somehow "Conservatism" suddenly has become remarkably like Treason to Rebellion. Since you ask my opinion you shall have it frankly, and I will begin with the first point.

While our army lately hesitated (your old rebel card friend Hotspur says, backed and filled) before Fredericksburg, upon the subject of shelling down the women and children, Jefferson Davis's letter was published, proclaiming the hanging of ten Union officers who should be captured in battle, as a reprisal for the lawful military punishment of ten rebels at the West. This is another illustration of the superior barbarism and deeper earnestness of the rebels. They have long spies and deserters, and will now hang officers in reprisal. The latter step is infamous, and the Government will not regret, of course, such hanging in retaliation to save loyal lives. But the whole management of the war upon the rebel side has forced and thrust upon us a lesson which we have refused to learn; that, as a rebellion is the most deadly of all, it must be waged with the most resolute firmness or its consequences will be incalculably more terrible.

Our leniency has been our loss. Rebel women have crossed and recrossed our lines at will. In Washington they have openly insulted and defied the Government. While the army was upon the peninsula the wife of the rebel Lee was boarding here within our camp and then honorably guarded out of it back to her husband, and Stuart immediately rode around our army, and revealed the necessity of moving it from the Peninsula to the James. The same nibbling half-heartedness was equally apparent elsewhere. I received a letter in the early autumn from an officer of mark who was soon after killed at the battle of Iuka. It was written from Buell's camp, and stated latterly and despondingly that the rebels in that region were sure of better treatment at hands of the Union men. It was inevitable that such conduct should bear fruit, and it appeared in such speeches as John Van Buren's, which were received with applause every where in the South; while the elections are considered by foreign Governments, as appears in the correspondence, to indicate the growth of peace sentiment in the country.

No nation can hope to be in earnest which is not. And no nation can conquer a rebellion which is not in deadly earnest. The relation of slavery to the war is a mere question of this earnestness, and has always been so. Every hearty, thoughtful man at the North knows it well. Every rebel knew it. Every foreigner said it. If we really meant to save the country and the Union in the most rapid and effective manner, it was clear that slavery would no more be allowed to interfere with that purpose than a bridge over a river. If it was right to destroy it, it was either because we did not appreciate the immense work we had undertaken, or because we did not wish to do it. For even granting that slavery had a constitutional existence, which it has not, being a mere municipal condition, how can those claim rights under a constitution against which they were fighting? Or, upon the other hand, what right had we to destroy the property of citizens, upon the constitution the enjoyment of privileges under it (assuming that they were so) which truly strengthened their hands to overthrow it?

The case from the beginning has been as simple as possible, except to men most assiduously superblisted our minds. To say that it was not evident that emancipation would give us the strong the question; for it was not evident that our army and navy would save us. What was evident was that the chances must be tried, and tried with overwhelming unanimity. Had that been our course our Thanksgiving this year would have been for peace instead of a country regenerated.

It has been equally clear from the beginning that if the nation chose to save it nothing was easier. All had every resource, and needed only the resolution. To a philosophic observer the question, after the fall of Donelson, was merely, Is this nation so demoralized that it will yield to the insurrection of the despotic interest which has so long governed it, or will it vindicate its Constitution and its principles? There is no other question now. If the question which the Conservatives—and to which is only the Northern face of the rebellion—can prevail, we shall have lost more than a hundred thousand lives, and more than a hard upon a thousand million of dollars, for worse than nothing. The moral system of the country will be brought to burning shame, and the hope of humanity every where be betrayed. Why not? A "Conservative" Cabinet of Cass and Buchanan men his friends, and chief among the "Conservative" orators of congratulation is one who frankly expressed his satisfaction when Fremont was taken and the United States flag dishonored by the rebels. How do Val. Winthrop and John Van Buren seriously differ from Jeff Davis? The latter openly says that we had better go through a form or two, and then let the whole Southern Union go. Is that your "Conservatism?" And yet where else can you stand if you do not heartily support every war measure of the Government, including the enemy?

Do not think me despondent of the good old cause, as Algernon Sidney called it "Liberty." I am far from that. Because it is clear that the peace which would follow the triumph of the reaction would be but a brief deliberative truce, after which the great battle which is now engaged between the two radical principles of this contest would burst forth anew, and rage until either the stars and stripes or the stars and bars were the single flag of this continent. And which it would be I have no doubt.

Dear John, faithfully yours,
THE LOUNGER.

STICK TO THE TEXT.

THERE are many conventions meeting from time to time in different parts of the country, which energetically resolve that they are for the Constitution; and immediately some orator bounds upon the platform and denounces out the most humbling and inhuman rhapsody about colored men. And why this incessant slander and vituperation of that great mass of population which, as a class, is the most inoffensive in the land? Is there any relation between the maintenance of the Constitution and maintaining a prejudice against those whose sole offense is that we have injured them? The Constitution prohibits upon the rebels even citizens under the old Confederation shall be citizens of the Union. And as Judge Curtis showed, by simple reference to the facts of history which Judge Taney entirely disregarded, colored men were citizens in five of the thirteen original States, one of which was North Carolina. In that State they continued to be citizens until a few years since the law disfranchised them.

Now an orator may think that colored men, or Indians, or Irish immigrants, or Germans, are born off as slaves; he may think that Christianity requires that some people shall be used and sold like cattle, but that is a question which has nothing to do with the Constitution. The Constitution is as it is and as it was may be maintained in every letter and every dot and stop, and yet every colored man in the country be a citizen. Let us stick to the text. When the point is the maintenance of the Constitution, all the rubbish of old political distinctions and men who are fit for slaves is out of order. Besides, the audience may have their own opinions, as they listen to such stuff, as to who is or is not fit for slavery; and the opinion might not coincide with that of the orator, nor be in the least complimentary to him. Stick to the text. It is very clear. If some of the speeches made against them blankets colored people had been made to them, there might be those who were not at all sorry that the orators had to taste a little wholesome bitterness.

But if the conventions and orators consent to abide by the text, namely, the Constitution, the Constitution as it is, will they be kind enough to specify who is against it except the rebels? Do they think that the party which elected Lincoln and Administration is an unconstitutional party? Do they believe that any unconstitutional action upon its part produced this rebellion? Was the election unconstitutional? Was the supplying a United States garrison in a United States fort unconstitutional? Was the summoning of troops to retake national property, forcibly wrested and detained from the Government, unconstitutional? Was the attempt to put down by force of arms a rebellion aimed at the existence of the very Constitution itself? Not even Fernando Wood would dare to say so, because he dares to say nothing which he does not suppose powerful sympathy. Therefore, and there is no party which has been hardy enough to take this ground, except the rebels, and they have been taught a bloody reason to take the text.

If the conventions mean in good faith the maintenance of the Constitution, let them be prepared to support, with all their force, the authorities charged by the Constitution itself with its defense? Why do they not demand their withdrawal upon those who defy it and make bloody war upon it? Why do they stupidly vituperate an unfortunate class of persons who have never been the first to spread the least disloyalty to the Constitution?

Simply because they do not mean in good faith what they say. They do not mean the unconditional maintenance of the Constitution. They mean only the maintenance of a party. As the contractor Hook, whom Patrick Henry has cruelly dealt with during the session of the convention through the American camp in the darkest hour of the revolution, "Beef! beef! beef!" so they, in the present crisis of the country, cry, "Democrats with fury, "Party! party! party!" They judge men not by their devotion to the country, but to a party. Such men, it is clear, are not friends of the Union but of the resuscitation of a party.

Now every faithful citizen who means the national salvation must act either with these men or the unconditional Union men. There is no middle ground to stand upon. The rebels will be served by insisting upon the absolute surrender of the rebels, and using every known means of warfare to secure it. That is the text. It is very clear. The nation is the final tribunal of its own existence. Let every citizen stick to the text, and act accordingly.

HUMANITY IN WAR.

WHEN we appeared before Fredericksburg ought we not to have insisted upon an immediate surrender? Then we should certainly protect the rebels. If they could secure a little delay they could be at Fredericksburg exactly when they did at Richmond—bring up all their men and defend Richmond upon the Rappahannock. The cities are separated by only a few hours' run upon the railroad. If they could cajole us or hold us in any way, every moment was golden to them and disastrous to us. Of course it is very easy for those people to sit quietly at home and abuse military movements. But what should we have done at Fredericksburg? It does not follow because a man is not a soldier that therefore he has not common sense. And if there be common sense in any thing at all in military, he is capable of perceiving it. Nor does a man at a distance know all the facts in the case. But he does know them in substance. When, for instance, we summoned the city, we either had not force enough to reduce it, or we had not and a very foolish thing—or we really held it at our mercy—in which case we should have required an instant surrender.

But the women and children. Yes, but it was not we who put them there, Mr. Mayor. The General should have said, "I am here with my army, and I win this city. Within two hours you must give it to me, or take the consequences." If the mayor and the citizens wished to save the lives of their helpless population, it was perfectly in their power without the least dishonor to do so. They had only to say that they yielded to superior force, and that the rebels would never take the town. They might have been as rhetorical as their hats and they chose about the bloodthirsty barbarians who would not give them time to build forts and get reinforcements; but their military rhetoric is mere fanfaronade and bluster, while their military action is unquestionably skillful.

Besides, there are other women and children to be considered besides those in the city. By giving them time to prepare for defense while they sent away their women, we allowed the rebel marksmen shot the hearts of other women whose sons and husbands and lovers would be slain. The rebels knew perfectly well for forty-eight hours previously that our army was moving upon Fredericksburg. They knew that it would have the city even at the cost of a fight. They had plenty of time to remove the defenseless population. But they chose to stay, because they believed they could outwit us by an appeal to humanity, and meanwhile gain most valuable and essential time. Whether it was more humane to grant that time than to insist upon the surrender, the event will show.

A SOLDIER'S SONG BOOK.

THERE was some innocent lesting last year upon the proposals for a National Hymn. But the feeling which called for the songs seems to have been sufficiently satisfied with "John Brown's body," which is hummed, and whistled, and ground, and played all over the loyal land; while the national regimental bands have taught it to every dismayed echo in the Blue Ridge. But for singing in the camp, on the march, at the mess, there should be endless songs. The German element knows how important a part such songs play in the college and camp life of Germany, and that sense of our more familiar and chaster airs are well-defined love-tone songs. If we could have them fitted to timely English words how cheering they might be to the soldiers! There is no need that they should be great solemn national hymns. In fact, that is exactly what they ought not to be. Rich, homely, hearty strains, full of fire and love and humor and tenderness, so that every varying emotion should flow out in rhyme.

That is just what the songs in a little book just prepared in Cambridge are. It is a collection of original songs, "by various hands," set to easy and striking tunes, and printed with the music on the voice, in the style of the German song books. Many an old favorite of every circle of young men is here, with words which have the same significance for them that other words had for other youth in other lands and times. Indeed one chief interest of this little book is to show how hearty earnestness of patriotism which is implied in every line. The book is sold at the price of making, and the profits will vet be very small, we come. It can be very readily enlarged, and from time to time, doubtless, new editions will contain new songs.

One of the quaintest airs and rhymes is this, to the tune of "The Frankfort Apprentice's Song":

THE WHY AND WHEREFORE.

"Where, where, where, and where, and where are you bound, young man?
Where, where, where, and where, and where are you bound, young man?"
"I'm off to the war, with the good men and true,
And hadn't you better come along too?
I speak my mind quite freely,
Now rarely."

"Why, why, why, and why, and why to the war, young man?
Why, why, why, and why, and why to the war, young man?"
"Did a man ever fight for a holier cause
Than for Freedom and Right and the Flag of Stars Laws?
Just speak your mind quite freely,
Now rarely."

"Which, which, which, and which, and which is too long of the Free?
Which, which, which, and which, and which is the Flag of the Free?"
"Oh, Washington's Flag, with the stripes and the stars,
Which to-day is the symbol of Union with the bars!
I speak my mind quite freely,
Now rarely."

"Who, who, who, and who, and who goes with you to the war?
Who, who, who, and who, and who goes with you to the war?"
"Ten thousand brave lads, and if they should stay here
The girls would cry shame, and they'd volunteer!
They speak their mind quite freely,
Now rarely."

"When, when, when, and when, and when do you mean to come back?
When, when, when, and when, and when do you mean to come back?"
"When Rebellion is crushed, and the Union restored,
And Freedom is safe—you, then, please the Lord!
I speak my mind quite freely,
Now rarely."

"What, what, what, and what, and what will you gain by that?
What, what, what, and what, and what will you gain by that?"
"Oh I've gained enough, whatever the cost,
If a Free Land be the fruit of the world, but lost.
I speak my mind quite freely,
Now rarely."

EXPECTATION.

ALL eyes and minds are turned with intense anxiety to Virginia—to the army under General Burnside. If the army of Lee is defeated the most serious obstacle to our success will vanish. With the overthrow of that army; the descent of the Mississippi by Porter; the capture of Charleston, Mobile, and Savannah; and the advance of Grant and Rosecrans in the West, the rebels would begin the winter gloomily.

There is an old argument against the continuance of the rebellion which is now disused. It was and is good in itself, but its use was untimely. The general impression at the North was that the rebels could not feed themselves, and must at last be starved out. They have not been starved out yet, however. They have seemed to thrive upon privation. But the fact of privation, and that scarcity, can hardly be doubted. And the argument will become more and more pinching.

If Mr. Benly's estimate of the cotton crop for the last year be correct, there has not been an adequate preparation for food at the South. The former Stonewall Jackson says that he prefers to have his men a little starved when they go into battle. But no wise ruler wishes his people to be hungry.

The probability ought not, however, to be overstated. If we could count upon an indefinite time for the war, it might be that privation would become an effective ally. But as war is a single day, because it might be possible to starve them out hereafter, would be courting disaster. The rebellion is to be ended by military victory while rapidly struck. Disaster upon disaster must overwhelm the enemy. Their trained and determined soldiers must be outnumbered as well as outfought. The success of to-day must make that of to-morrow possible and easy. To fight for a day and then stand still for six weeks; to win, or seem to win, a victory and gain no advantage; to occupy with pomp ground from which the foe has retired; are not the ways in which desperate rebels are crushed. They are courses that deaden and destroy a nation.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

MISS FANTALINGO says the first time she looked seria with a young man, she felt like Hope leaning on her anchor. Pretty young woman that.

About half a century ago there was a very popular preacher in Aberdeen named Kidd. On the arrival there of the news of the destruction of Napoleon's fleet, a shrewd woman said to her crony, "Eh, Tibby! d'ye hear this? they've shot the admiral's flagship." "Hoot sir!" exclaimed Tibby, "was they shot Dr. Kidd?"

Speed and Stow, the two most distinguished historians of the eighteenth century, were both tailors, which led Sir Henry Spelman to say, "We are beholden to Mr. Speed and Mr. Stow for stitching by to our English history."

"When I goes a shopping," said an old lady, "I allers asks for what I wants, and if they have it, and it's suitable, and I feel inclined to take it, and it's cheap, and it can be got at any place for less, I almost allers take it, without suffering about it all day, as most people do."

A trifling cort of a fellow in one of our neighboring counties, not long since, was the affections of the daughter of a bluff, honest Dutchman of some wealth. On asking the old man for her, he opened with a romantic speech about his being "a poor young man," etc. "Ya, ya," said the old man, "I knows all spout it; but you is a little too poor—you has neider money nor character."

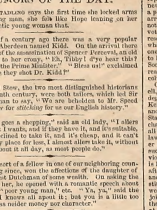
A notorious tippler was one day walking along in his usual inebriated state, when he stepped upon a grating, which was inadvertently out of place by the cellar. Alarmed he and the grating disappeared into the cellar. After picking himself up, he looked around and found to take a survey of the place when he espied the grating, which he took hold of, with the remarks, "Well, I have made a gridiron by my performance may be!"

A lady who had a silk gown quilted in being received brought an action against the establishment, and commenced several of the workmen to give their sloping testimony.

An old sailor feeling a rotted bottle floating on the sea, opened it, with the expectation of finding "Rum," but instead, he jumps!" and then threw it back into the water.

A GOOD ENCOURAGEMENT.—" Och, sir! what's yer honor agoin' to give me, now, as I'll myself find me own boots, and bonor's noise from ourins? so aisey intirely?" "How so, my boy?" "Why, when it rowlad aisy, wasn't I the second one that hollered fire first?"

In British Columbia Captain Barret-Lennard presented himself lately with a pair of trousers. He returned them as "vain and foolish invention," but took care to cut off all the buttons.



A new cat-tracker has just been patented; It is so constructed as to crack joke along with the cats. A very ingenious invention, and we should be allowed to extremely depressed persons ordering large quantities.

Zeno, the philosopher, believed in an inevitable destiny. His servant availed himself of this doctrine while being beaten for a theft by exclaiming, "Was I not destined to rob?" "Yes," replied Zeno, "and to be corrected also."

If you think there isn't an honest man living, you had better, for appearance's sake, put off saying it till you are dead yourself.

A dentist in this city advertises that he will "spare no pains" in extracting unruly teeth. Surprising candor!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

BOTH Houses met on 1st December. In the Senate, after prayer by Mr. Pierpont, Sunderland, the usual message was sent to the House, to say that a quorum was present. The House was then called to order, and received and read.——In the House, after prayer by Chaplain Pockrow, Mr. Rogers, of New Jersey, introduced a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to report the cheapest and most expeditious means of transporting the troops now stationed at Newport News to Carolina. A resolution, offered by Mr. Vallandigham, directing the Judiciary Committee to report by what authority Secretary Stanton ordered various newspapers from the mails, was adopted. Mr. Cox offered a resolution instructing the Committee relating to military arrests, condemning them, and directing that they shall not be hereafter made. They were laid on the table, by a vote of 89 to 46. Mr. Richardson, of Illinois, offered a resolution directing the Committee to inform the House what citizens of Illinois are now confined as political prisoners, and what are the charges against them. A motion to lay it on the table failed, and it was passed, 74 to 40. A resolution that Thanksgiving Sunday was received and read. The document is received in the leader in another column.

On Tuesday, December 2, in the Senate, Senator Powell, of Kentucky, offered a resolution calling on the President for information in regard to arrests of citizens of Kentucky by the military authorities; also a preamble and resolution declaring that many citizens of the United States have been arrested and imprisoned without any charges being preferred against them whatever, and that all such arrests are unauthorized by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and are usurpation of the power delegated by the people to the President; and that all such arrests are a wide conception and defined palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States; and it is hereby demanded that all such persons shall soon be set free, and that all persons so arrested shall have a prompt and speedy trial," according to the provisions of the Constitution," or be immediately released. Then resolutions were laid over. Senator Harris, of Kentucky, offered a joint resolution declaring that it is hereby recommended to the State Governments of Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and Arkansas, that on the first Monday of April next, to take the sense of the people on the condition of the country and the proper means to be pursued for restoring the Union, and that the Legislatures of the different States take such action as they may deem fit for this purpose at the earliest possible date. This was also laid over, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a bill was passed providing for the payment in gold and silver of all judgments recovered by the United States. The Military Committee were instructed to inquire into the propriety of increasing the pay of soldiers to fifteen dollars per month, and making reductions in the pay of officers not actively engaged. The Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire and report as to the propriety of admitting cotton brought from foreign countries free of duty. A bill was introduced for the relief of the sufferers by the Indian outbreak in Minnesota; also, the Government will receive bonds for the seamen and the Street Indians. A bill to reduce the tax on whisky was brought before the House, and made the order of the day for the next session.

THE REPORT OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The Secretary of War in his Report states that the portion of the United States which is now, or has been during the last year the scene of military operations is confined to an area within seven degrees; that the armies operating in those departments, according to recent official returns, contain a force of seven hundred and seventy-three thousand three hundred and thirty-six officers and privates, well armed and equipped; that since the date of the returns this number has been increased to over eight hundred thousand, and when the quotas are filled it will number a million of men; and that the value of our loyal real estate is about seven thousand millions of dollars. The Report of Secretary Welles has been distinguished at Fort Warren, Fortress Fair Oaks, Gulnare's Mill, Malvern Hill, Cross Roads, Golding's Houston, Chenailla, and other places.

The Report is accompanied by a report and documents from General Halleck, Commander-in-Chief.

THE NAVY REPORT.

The Report of Secretary Welles is very long. When he assumed charge of the Navy Department in March, 1861, there were but seventy-six men in commission, and only a dozen afloat. There were only 7500 seamen then in the pay of the Government, and on the 30th of March only 1,000 all the ports and receiving-ships of the Atlantic coast. The men-of-war and protect the Navy-yards and arsenals, and aid in suppressing the rising insurrection. At the present time, by purchase and by construction, the Government has added, or is preparing to complete, a naval force of 427 vessels, mounting 2,557 guns, and manned by a force of 51,000 seamen. This armament is not equal in modern times. Of the 427 vessels in service 154 only are sailing vessels, 129 are steam vessels, and 132 of these latter have been added by construction. These new vessels of war are of no mean capacity and calibre, as the following description of them will show:

Description.	No.	Tons.	No. of Guns.
Second-class iron steam sloops of war	12	10,886	96
Screw gun-boats	23	5,160	46,033
Side-wheel gun-boats	17	10,000	17,000
Armored wooden vessels	12	65	59,893
Armored iron vessels	14	10,000	84,000
Total	139	56,111	139,339

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

The rebels are actively engaged in erecting earth-works around Fredericksburg. General Burnside has not crossed the Rappahannock. He is now in full and good health. The railroad from Falmouth to Aquia Creek is now being relaid. A deck of the steamer Baltic, in this service was made across the Rappahannock on 28th ult. a short distance above the railroad bridge, and is nearly nearly two companies of the Third Pennsylvania cavalry, of General Averell's command, were captured.

BURNSIDE AT WASHINGTON.

General Burnside paid a hasty visit to Washington on Friday night, and had an interview of nine hours with the President.

THE MOVES OF THE WEST IN MOTION.

The army, according to a dispatch from Cairo, is all in motion. General Sherman, it is said, left Memphis on 30th, and General Grant commenced to move on 29th along the road to Holly Springs. The rebels, meantime, are falling back toward Grenada, tearing up the track as they go. They carry off the rails, burn the bridges, and destroy the ties as they retreat. It is reported that the rebels are removing the negroes from the line of Grant's advance.

DEPARTURE OF GENERAL BANKS.

A portion of General Banks's expedition left the port on 5d or 6th inst. This vessel consisted of the United States steamers Mississippi, Monongahela, Sachem, Arthur Light, Sixth State, J. R. Graves, Rose, Sidney, and others, with troops and provisions. The details will probably rendezvous at Fortress Monroe.

BIG SURGEONS IN THE FIELD.

An expedition of the federal regiments, South Carolina Volunteers, under Lieutenant-Colonel Beard, made quite a successful raid into the interior of the rebel country, and the negroes behaved very commendably. It is rumored that General Hunter has issued a proclamation declaring the freedom, and that the inhabitants are moving their property accordingly.

ATTACK ON NEWBERN.

A party of 4000 rebels, under General Martin, made an attack on Newbern, North Carolina, on 27th, but they were beaten off with loss. The rebels were led and commanded by Colonel Kurtz, of the Massachusetts Twenty-fifth.

THE PIRATE "ALABAMA."

The Navy Department has received news that the pirate Alabama was expected in the vicinity of the Azores early in October. Orders were to receive vessels from pursuit and summon from the steamer Tuscarora. The Turkish Minister Mahmoud Nedim Pasha has been received here for Captain Semmes. Several United States vessels are in that neighborhood. The Vanderbilt arrived on 29th, without having seen her.

RELEASE OF STATE PRISONERS.

The release of the State prisoners from the Forts Warren, Lafayette, and Mifflin, was announced, to appear by the following order:

"Ordered, That Major-Gen. Fort Warren, Boston:

"The Secretary of War directs that you release all the Maryland State prisoners under you, any other prisoners now in your custody, and report to this office.

"By D. Townsend, Assistant Adjutant-General."

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

THE FRENCH OFFER TO MEDIATE.

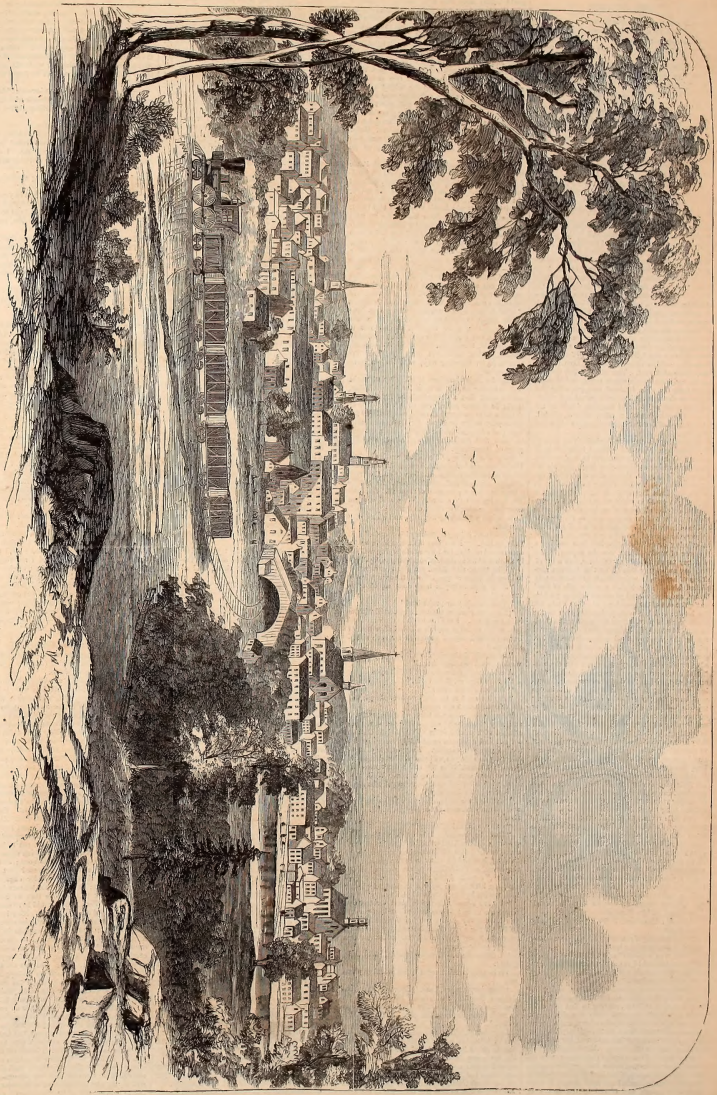
We have the text of the dispatch of M. Drouyn de l'Huys respecting mediation. He says:

"Our relations with America have for us an armed force were not on the footing of peace. Our ships of war were not in a commercially kept up. After so much bloodshed, and so many ruins accumulated, and no question, nothing authorizing the presumption that more decisive battles by operations will shortly occur, according to the last news received in Europe. The two armies, on the contrary, were in a position that would not allow either party to hope within a brief delay for any decided advantage, and the two armies and accustomed to the contrary opposite. All these circumstances, taken together, point to the opportunity of an armistice, by which, supposing neither the present circumstances, no strategical objection can be made. The favorable dispositions of which the two parties are beginning to manifest themselves in the North as well as the South are, on the other hand, several steps that might be made to recommend the idea of truce. The Emperor, in the interest of humanity, in the interest of the commerce of the world, desiring to lend to the parties the good offices of the maritime Powers, and his Majesty has charged me to propose to the cabinet of London to concert to her Britannic Majesty, as well as to the Court of Russia, to the Court of Austria, and even that of Prussia and Italy, to unite, as well as with the Confederates, to obtain an armistice for six months, during which time the efforts of Protector or indirect, should providentially cease, on an as well as on land, and in which, if necessary, diplomatically proposed.

"The overture, I need not say, Sir, would not imply, on our part, any judgment on the origin or issue of the struggle, nor any engagement upon the question of principle, it is to be hoped, cease in favor of the conciliation. Our task would consist in only seeking down obstacles, and in interfering only in a measure determined upon by the two parties."

THE BRITISH REPLY.

Lord John Russell, in his reply, says: "After weighing all the information which has been received from American sources, her Majesty's Government feel to the conclusion that there is no ground at the present moment to hope that the French Government would accept the proposals suggested, and a refusal from Washington at the present time would prevent any speedy renewal of the offer. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, therefore, that it would not further to urge the proposal in question in America, and that the moment appears favorable for any such step. It does not undergone, or may undergo hereafter, any change, but the course might then with advantage be taken by other friendly counsel with a greater prospect than at present exists of its being accepted by the two contending parties."



RUSSIA.

RUSSIA WILL NOT INTERFERE.

After recalling the constant efforts of Russia in favor of conciliation, Prince Gortschakoff says that it is repetitio, declares all thought of offering public opinion in favor of whatever may be the susceptibility of that nation. We believe that a combined measure of the three great Powers, however conciliatory, if presented in an official or offensive character, would be the cause of arousing at a month proposed to pacification. If, however, France should persist in her intention of intervening, and if England should coincide in her course, instructions shall be sent to Baron de Budberg, Russian Minister, to join in the step which there the French and English Ministers, if not official ally, at least moral support.

TREASURES.

A curl of dark brown hair,
Hid in a locket of gold;
A ring set round with pearls,
Of fashion quaint and old.

That locket nestles close
In my bosom, night and day;
That ring—since it left the finger
Of the dear one far away.

The ring I wear for hope,
The locket I wear for faith;
The heart that throbs beneath them
Will be true till my day of death.

Take them both to my lover,
When I am freed from strife:
There are many joined by death
Who might never be one in life.

OUTWITTED.

A lonely little parlor neighboring only long undulating sweeps of hill-side and shadowed valleys—a room with small regard for rules and precedents, independently persisting in being airy and cheerful spite of dark wood floor and wainscoting and heavy curtains; decidedly progresista in its chair and sofa principles, putting them where they were likely to be wanted, and evidently as incapable of buhl, biscotine, and all manner of étagère abominations, as a fair field of growing purple velvet violets; particular, also, about its pictures, of which it offered you but two.

Heads seen only in profile, and exactly similar in hard inflexibility of outline; yet on the downcast lids of one dwelt perpetual hush and silence. The rapt face was full of the mystery of sleep; the far-seeing, solemn eyes might have been looking into those of Azrael. The other rushed through space; by some subtle magic every curl blowing back from the wide forehead was quivering and instinct; the untried lips were parted and eager; all the fresh splendor of morning dwelt in the proud eyes; both without color, without symbol, yet no need of flame or star to interpret night and morning.

Below them, a monster flanked either side of the fire-place; perverted Chinese imaginings of vases, crowded with flowers, and in that way put down, something as Truth does High Art, by the inflexible little room, that coming round past the piano to the view, went off in a bow-window, in which sat Lute Howard. A little thing that a man might crush in his hand, mocking a cursory glance, defying all description, because her charm was in the look of the deep gray eyes, the peculiar timbre of her voice, the clinging touch of her little fingers, the spirit of her whole manner, rather than in coloring or outline. She had been making a pretense of work. There was the sewing basket in a gay tangle of silks and ribbons, and a bit of braiding and a tiny thimble on the timorous outskirts of her lap, in which Fidèle had comfortably settled himself; for Fidèle was the gift of Paul Ogère, and a privileged character—not to pet him was quite out of the question; and then Vivia left the lounge and her book, and going over to the piano began to play. Now Vivia played marvelously. It was as if it had been the story whispered among the pines on some solemn mountain top, telling, in soft, half-breathed chords, of the still glow quivering and quickening along the gray sky's edge, swelling into hurry and tumult with the tossing of clouds in the valleys below, dashed with scarlet and gold as the day grew stronger, hurrying, struggling to grasp and sound out in one wild burst the glory of color and of the morning rejoicing—fading, dying, leaving it all at last to one sweet voice, coming out of the land of mist and burning with the brook; this last imaged forth in trickling, dropping notes, going on with blare of fairy horns, and wild echoes tossed from mountain to mountain, muttering darkly of rocky clefts and awful gorges, growing, deepening, coming headlong down jagged descents with strong, reckless bounds, spreading out into tranquil lakes, cutting off little pine-shadowed islets, but above all the gurgling, and whispering, and thundering, and out of wailing and shuddering depths, in all and through all, sounding the one sweet morning voice.

The little room was flooded, drenched with the harmony. Lute listened, shivering and with eyes filled with tears; while from the opposite window Dale Hamilton watched her, thinking what superb eyes she had, and how her white thrilled face looked like a picture, and how odd it was that such a little snow-drop should nestle so warmly in his heart, and what a stunner Vivia was!—admired the music, too, in his way. Saw that the difficulties were prodigious, and that Vivia made light of them, and at the end was incautious enough to cry "Brava!" Lute turned on him like flame.

"Captain Hamilton, I think you would clap Mont Blanc."

"Undoubtedly, if you mean Miss Vivia, only she seems to me something more tropical."

"And why tropical?" asked Vivia, facing round with a sudden whirl of the piano stool.

Dale was at fault and shifted the responsibility.

"Ask your mirror."

Which Vivia answered by a shrug, and going over to Lute couched on the floor beside her, as she was fond of doing, offering to that fair child such a contrast as pearls and carbuncles, purple and snow, the opal light before dawn, and a stormy sunset. She was far above the ordinary height of woman, her chest was full and broad, her arm muscular as well as handsome. Her face defied you. An intensity of something (Dale never could determine what) burned in her look, sent the passionate blood surging up to her lips, glowing scarlet in the clear brown cheek, lined itself sharply in every irregular feature, and blazed in the dark eyes, though deeper wisdom than Captain Hamilton's could hardly have told what manner of spirit it was that looked out from their inscrutable depths. Her dress flamed out in a barbaric magnificence. Scarlet showed here and there against the soft blue of her robe; an orange-colored knot fastened the lace frill at her throat, tiny gold coins dangled from the net that scarcely held the heavy coils of hair; color and sparkle was in every thing, even to the gay border of her handkerchief, and the steel fringe on her slipper; altogether such a face and figure as might have been looked for behind a gilded screen in Vathek's palace, or leaning over a marble sill, to peer down into the dark and secret waters bearing black curtained gondolas up to the very carved door-way; any where but in that quiet little parlor. Decidedly there was a mystery. Under all the careless talk and jesting of the past two weeks reserve was on one side, suspicion on the other.

If ever the domestic barometer stood at Panic it was on the morning that Dale, leaving his handful of cavalry in the little village below, galloped up to see Lute, whom he had sworn should not resist him always. If ever there was an incomprehensible story it was Lute's account of this Vivia, a friend of whom Dale (who had grown up with her) had never heard. If ever there was unaccountable daring, it was that of this girl who had chosen to traverse a distracted country with no other protection than that of an infirm old uncle, at a time when Federalists and Confederates occupied M—— in such quick succession that often while one end of the street was clattering with retreating cavalry the other resounded with the quick advancing tramp and triumphal roll of drums. If ever there was an old man whose hand looked as if it might forget its trembling, whose eyes gave the lie direct to wrinkles and white hair, whose back seemed as if its manifest destiny was to straighten, and whose totter came often perilously near a stride, it was this uncle of Vivia's, this Mr. Borden, taking snuff and being deaf near the hearth, in an afflicting way, as if from a stern sense of duty.

Hard for Dale Hamilton, twirling his mustache and watching keenly from under his eyelashes, not to think that a decrepitude so lightly worn might be thrown aside, even though the days of miracles were past, and show him—who knew?—Lieutenant Ogère perhaps; for Dale, who must have had a league with the birds of the air, chanced to know that his old rival was absent from the camp on secret duty.

Dale was better soldier than musical critic. His keen senses had caught the something unusual in the moral atmosphere, and he was on the track with the persistence of a sleuth-hound. Meanwhile silence had taken possession of them all. Doubtful Mr. Borden was in a doze. Vivia still couched near Lute, resting her cheek on Lute's little hand. Lute herself sat flushing uneasily, and with downcast lids.

"The angel is long in making his rounds," said Dale, at last. "I am sure his wings have never once neared my lips, for I have been trying uselessly all this while to think of something to say."

"Why try at all? Have you given bonds never to keep the peace?" quoth Vivia, the sarcastic.

"It is plain that you have done so, oh mine enemy!"

"Well, was it your profession?"

"Civilized warfare, but not such guerrilla skirmishing as yours. I can't so much as show my head but, whiz! one of you sends a bullet after me. I begin to think myself no match for such sharpshooters."

"Samson in the hands of two Delilahs. Be sure we don't send you back shorn."

A cold, cruel gleam shone in Dale's eyes.

"I have done so, Miss Vivia."

"You have done what?"

"Pardon me, but we don't go over the plan of our campaign with our enemies."

"As you like; but you know what that eminent authority 'Somebody' says—that man never yet climbed with painful effort up any height that he did not find a woman comfortably seated on the top. I give you warning. Keep your keys carefully; for do what you will you will have reason to chant 'laudamus,' if in the end I don't turn the guns of your own citadel upon you. Well, Mrs. Hall, what is it?"—(to the housekeeper who stood hesitating in the door-way.)

"If Miss Lute will please come here a moment and tell me what rooms I am to give Captain Hamilton's men—"

"Captain Hamilton's men!"

"Don't be alarmed. It is not the whole Southern army, as Mrs. Hall would have you think, only seven or eight of my fellows, whom I ordered here, thinking it would be better to have a guard about the house, as Federal troops are reported in the vicinity," explained Dale, leaning back, and scanning the little group with a keen-edged glance, that, resting last on Lute, said plainly,

"I have done with waiting and forbearance. Know me at last as the man whose iron purpose you have never shaken one hair's-breadth"—and holding her in a sort of fascinated attention till the angry flush and sparkle had dimmed away into a ghastly pallor—then,

"I think there will be no trouble," said Dale, gently.

Vivia gave Lute's hand a quick warning pressure.

"I am very hungry, Lute. Do you propose that Captain Hamilton's men shall be served up for supper, or will you give Mrs. Hall a hint what to do with them, and get them out of the way of the coffee?"

Lute started, got up mechanically and went out, and Vivia seated herself beside Dale. Her wide flowing skirts half buried him, her sleeve touched his, her every breath set free some vague sweet scent like the spirit of perfume. An incautious movement had tangled the heavily-wrought fringe on her bracelet with the lace of her sleeve, and she held out to him an arm and wrist not of the most delicate mould, but glancing white as snow in the dim light. Separating them proved no easy task. The lace was d'Alençon—impossible that it should be torn! the twilight was hard upon them, and Dale must sit very close to see. He cared not a whit for this mighty beauty—in his heart he had christened her Nimrod—but the soft curls swept his forehead, and the bright cheek was perilously close to his, and so Captain Hamilton was in no hurry.

Meantime Mr. Borden roused from his doze and shuffled out unnoticed, and Lute somewhere thawed out her benumbed faculties and came back looking very much as usual. Mrs. Hall brought in candles, and shut out the discontented wind and the eager darkness, and Lute brewed nectar, known as Mocha, in an arrangement that looked irresistibly like a lecture on chemistry; and the three sat cozily about the fire together, and fortunately there was no revealer of secrets to write out the thoughts of their hearts in letters of flame, and send them recoiling to opposite corners of the room in consternation like Belshazzar's.

So the time slipped lazily along with them, till at last they came to bedtime, and Lute could take her great anxiety to her own room and have it to herself.

It was then half past ten. She laid her watch on the toilet cushion, replaced her rustling skirts and heeled boots by a merino wrapper and soundless slippers, and sat down as if waiting. The hands traveled slowly on. The house settled down into such silence that Lute was half afraid to trust the air with her breathing lest it should sound out too noisily. Eleven o'clock—half past—a quarter to twelve—then her numbed heart began to beat to suffocation—ten minutes—five—three—she opened wide her door, put out the candle, and stole down the broad stairs. The gloom was profound, the stillness could be felt; but Lute thought that all the air vibrated to her passing, and that dumb matter itself would ring in the ears of the sleepers above. There is something stirring. The library-door was just ajar, the shadow denser there if possible, and, a little lighter than the surrounding blackness, but motionless as if a part of it—something stood directly before her.

She stretched out a timid little hand.

"Is it Paul?"

By way of answer the waif was seized in a firm, warm clasp and covered with kisses; and a pale point of light, gleaming faintly through the open fretwork of a vase shot up in a clear flame, striking on a gilt shoulder-strap and a sword-hilt, and showing the earnest, sparkling face of a man of twenty-seven or eight.

"Tardy little thing! behind the hour as usual," he whispered. "I have been waiting here an age!"

"Oh, hush! you are too loud."

"Too loud! for what? The mice will never tell of us. Sit here. I want to look at you. Such a shy child as you have been all these tantalizing two weeks, always at my finger ends, and always eluding me! Believe me, I have kept a record of all you have made me suffer, and have sworn to exact a righteous revenge."

All the while he was eagerly trying to look into the downcast face, but could see only the dark lashes resting on the ashy cheek, and a little rounded bit of chin.

"What am I to understand?" he asked, at last. "Have I displeased you?"

"No."

"Are you afraid of me?"

"Oh no!"

"Don't you love me?"

"Oh, Paul, how can you ask? But you know, you must feel yourself, how strange, how dreadful it is to meet like this!"

"I have been risking my life for the last two weeks to see you," he answered, gravely. "I suppose that is dreadful too; though it is worse than all, to my thinking, that you have neither word nor look for me at what is perhaps our last meeting."

"I think my presence here should be proof that I love you; but you do not know what terrors are distracting me. You are in immediate, pressing danger. I am sure Dale suspects."

"Are you no further in your conclusions? Then I have news for you. I am sure that Captain Hamilton has read our riddle, and—not suspects, but knows. You heard him this afternoon: now come to the window, close. Do you hear that? Steps are they not? pacing up and down with a regular measured tramp, and a slight click just now? He is setting his musket down to rest."

"He! what! You do not mean there is a sentinel without?"

"Exactly: and if you should go to the further door, as I have done, you would hear one there; and if you should venture into the bow-window, you would find one there; and another on the side of the dining-room, and one guarding the kitchen-way. The house is surrounded. You see Captain Hamilton plays to win."

"And you—"

"I have: hark!"—for in the air was that vague thrill and stir, not the echo of a step, not the sounding of a breath, yet surely some one coming. The faint flame quivered, leaped up and died out into blackness. Paul held Lute a moment close against his heart, and was gone into the darkness. Cold damp bathed her from head to foot, her knees bent, deathlike faintness assailed her, her heart stopped almost as she went dizzily toward the door. But she had not time to reach it. Outstretched fingers met her groping hand and closed upon it. She slipped, spirit-like, from the firm grasp, but it followed her close, caught her by the shoulder, touched her hair, her cheek, her icy hands.

"Lute! I thought so," said a voice. It was Dale. Dragging her after him, he lighted the lamp swinging low over the reading-table. His first glance was at her deathlike face, his second about the room: it was vacant, and Lute could not suppress a sigh of relief.

Dale caught the sigh, guessed its meaning, and flushed darkly. Thrusting her into a chair, "Sit there till I come back," he said, half savagely.

Common enough in romance, such swift terror, such crushing anguish comes in reality hardly once to one lifetime out of fifty; and Lute sat stunned beneath it, not even capable of shaping into words her prayer for help. Looking scarce alive, Dale found her on his return; and as he stood looking down on her his dark face softened in spite of himself, she was such a fragile, nestling little creature, and looked so utterly woeful. And she was the woman he had loved all his life, and he longed beyond measure to gather her up in his arms and to his heart. For the moment he forgot that she loved Paul Ogère.

"Oh, Lute, if you would but love me!" he burst out on the sudden. But she shrank with only too palpable aversion from his kindling glance, his extended arms.

He grew white to the very lips.

"I will buy Lieutenant Ogère's charm of him for his life," he said, with smothered passion, "though I will not prove so exacting. I will not require midnight meetings. I will only ask civility."

The sneering tone, the stinging sarcasm, made Lute's torpor white heat.

"The life of Paul Ogère is not yet in your gift," she answered, with spirit, "and our midnight meeting rests on your assertion. But be it so. You have no right to taunt me. I love him, and I am his affianced wife."

"You love him! You dare tell me that!"

"Yes, a hundred times over, with whatever force there is in my nature—so well that every thing besides him is tame, mean, and joyless, so that I can think of nothing pleasant without him—with all my heart and soul!"

"It is well," Dale answered, bitterly. "We were old schoolmates. I am not anxious to see him shot."

"What do you mean?"

"Simply this. I know perfectly that Paul Ogère is in this house. Long ago I penetrated his disguise. He wears old age too lightly to baffle Dale Hamilton. There is at this moment a guard before his door; there is one below his window; there are sentinels at every corner of the house. He is a Federal spy. My duty as a Confederate officer is clear enough, and should be paramount; but fortunately, perhaps, for him, I have in this case a love dearer than that of country—my love for you."

"Love!" echoed Lute, scornfully.

"Call it will, then, if you like—an intense desire—a firm intention—what you choose. I have seen scores of women prettier and wittier than you, but you please me; you are precisely what I should like and mean to find in my home. I like your deft touch, your soft voice, your clear look. Others may choose to wear such rainbow glories as that Vivia. I prefer the subtle flame burning in the lily vase. Never yet in my whole life have I wished uselessly; I shall not now."

Lute looked up with sudden flame in her eye, but Dale gave her no chance to speak.

"Hear me out. I have borne patiently your little slipper on my neck, because I waited for my hour. It is here now; and, believe me, I mean to use it. Know how determined I am when I tell you what I am about to sacrifice: my honor—the honor of a Hamilton! To use the advantage I have gained against one so helpless is base, and yet I mean to do it; to listen to any other prompting than that of duty deserves hanging, and I mean to do it. I am going to betray my country and myself; to sell you the life of the spy caught and imprisoned up stairs for your hand!"

Lute was silent.

"Your answer!" demanded Dale.

She was shivering, she was faint, trembling; but her will looked out at him, from the soft brown eyes, unshaken, indomitable.

"I will not commit a crime," she answered, slowly, "not to save Paul's life, were it in your power, as you say. A hundred times no!"

"I see. You do not believe," returned Dale, quietly. "Good. Perhaps to-morrow I shall find means to convince you. To-morrow evening I will hear your final answer. Now good-night!"

Lute made no answer, but went wearily up the stairs. Passing the door of Mr. Borden's room she saw the guard of which Dale had spoken pacing up and down before it, and smiled, meaningly.

Morning, that was not so far off when Lute and Captain Hamilton parted, came soon enough. Came also, though a little later than usual—as a consequence of the quiet little house's astonishment in finding itself a prisoner—breakfast. Dale made his appearance promptly. Lute came also, tolerably serene, though looking pale and heavy-eyed. But Mr. Borden, when called, responded not; and, on being searched for, was not to be found. Neither door nor window had been opened in his room; hiding-place there was none; and yet he was gone. Dale then remembered that he had not seen him since so blissfully engaged over Vivia's bracelet: but there was the meeting in the library. Dale was positive that he had heard voices there. How Borden could have escaped the sentinels passed comprehension. How he himself could have trusted so blindly to the mere fact of the guards he found hard to explain in the cool morning light. He had wished to spare Lute a scene; he had been so sure that he had Paul securely trapped. However, it helped very little to curse his folly now. Vivia also was non est. She had gone quietly to the stables perhaps a quarter of an hour before, possibly while the guard stationed at the kitchen-way was doing justice to the excellent coffee to which old Nanny had called his attention. Certainly so simple an occurrence needed not Dale's strained interpretation of the connivance of the cook in a plan of escape. "Nothing could well be more natural," as Lute coldly observed; the man was worn-out with his night's duty—the cook thoughtful. It was hard that mere acts of civility to Captain Hamilton's soldiers should be so harshly construed; and given this reprehensible sentinel busy over his coffee, it was still paying a poor compliment to Confederate valor not to suppose six of its champions a competent guard for an old man and a girl.

One man had seen Vivia dash past, he said, "like lightning, and had pointed his gun at her, but of course he didn't fire on a lady. He thought there could be no great mischief in a girl's having a scamper before breakfast, specially as out-and-enter like this one, that had been dashing over all the country ever since she had been there."

One faint gleam only showed on Dale's horizon as he arose inwardly over the stupidity of his subordinates. Vivia had taken what was familiarly known as the Old Road; while the more direct course for the country for Borden he could take a short cut leading down on the Old Road, and even fifteen minutes' start was not hopeless with a horse as fleet as Goliffe.

So he thought, dashing recklessly across the country, himself, barely for a flowing skirt and a cap and plume set daintily over short, crisp curls; saw them pursue, just before him, going at a steady, swinging pace.

"Vivia!" he called—"Vivia!"

She could hardly have heard him—it must have been instinct that made her turn—but she reined up in the first, waiting for him with the old bafflling, mocking smile.

"You ride early and fast, Captain Hamilton."

"I have need," said Dale, sternly, "your uncle (an emphasis on the noun) has escaped."

"Escaped what? the ills that flesh is heir to?" she asked, with perfect coolness.

"No; though he may have an excellent opportunity, if I can not catch him."

"Meantime you have not caught him."

"This is folly, Miss Vivia; you must ride back with me," returned Dale, with increasing irritation.

"Must! What is that? It is a word we never use with me. Will you speak English that a lady can understand?"

"I will supply you with a dictionary and a grammar on reaching home, and you may study them at leisure; but I can not alter the form of my speech. At this time, you are a mutinous person. You must return with me."

"Hands off!" exclaimed Vivia, with a dangerous sparkle of the eyes, as he attempted to take her reins. "If you have a 'must,' I have a will. I will ride where I choose, and I warn you not to cross me."

"Idle and unbecoming bravado," returned Dale, scarcefully drawing a breath.

"Once more I warn you."

"I insist—"

"You will have it, then;" and the butt end of a pistol came crashing down on his head with a force that felled him senseless. With a wild cheer she rode rapidly.

"Hard-headed Hamilton," that was his solitary set attack, and he has not altered," she muttered, springing from her saddle. "Let me see if —— is dead—this beggary!" as the stripped over her long skirt—"how do women ever get about in it?" And then the birds, if birds there were, must have a sense of astonishment at the sight of a pull, skirt, bauque, corset, and padding went to the winds; and cap, curls, and many coils of false hair followed, a second brood shortly bearing the stamp of a United States lieutenant, a closely shaved head, and an eagle-eyed, keen-faced artist, spite of paint and pencilling, looked sufficiently unfeminine—Paul Ogére, in short.

Meantime Dale was regaining his five little snowwhite teeth: "Lord, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power. Help us, O Lord our God, for we rest on thee!"

And Borden the venerable, otherwise Jack Borden, Paul's lieutenant, having prudently departed before the posting of the sentinels, had fallen in with a detachment of the Twelfth Illinois. And is not the rest written in the chronicle of the deliverance Vivia had possessed herself of the horse of one of the rebel troops, and mentioning the most daring reconnoissance of Lieutenant Ogére, and the capture of Captain Hamilton, entitled to the honorable present of all, one Dale, who, as she had promised long before, gladly locked prisoner, and not to rescue, and is at this present writing Mrs. Paul Ogére?

THE TRICK OF THE TRAPEZE.

WHEN I practised as a boy on the gymnastic "swinging-bar," nobody ever heard of a trapeze; but under that fine name the old-world trick of to-day now come into glory. Well it might, if there were truth in picture posters. Surely, methought, I have needs yet to learn. Never have I known the stiffen myself horizontally, with arms stretched to their utmost, fingers extended, and swing straight, with the other astounding that air of "kicking gracefulness" so much deprecated in painting, but so profoundly admired into woodcuts. Then, suddenly, to throw a somersault, as I in the habit of projecting my chin, forcing my arms forward as if about to take the first stroke in swimming. Yet, if artists really draw from life, as accessory to genius, I can suggest they did, these are the attitudes assumed by Leotard and his followers, and all my teachings are radically false. Of course I must try it myself, and had the satisfaction of finding that old-fashioned gymnastics were not to be despised at all, and that the strange attitudes of the performer are perhaps owing to the inability of the non-professional artiste to render their bodies answering movements of the trapezist. It is simply impossible for a man to grasp the trapeze-bar firmly by through the air as if he had been shot out of a catapult. If any one will take the trouble to watch a performer while passing along the series of trapezes, he will find that the position is almost entirely perpendicular, and that when he is sweeping through the air between the trapezes the body is as upright as when he stands on the dull earth. Neither is the strange gymnast foolish enough to put out his arms after the fashion of engravings. He keeps his arms bent, with hands close to the chest, ready to dart them out and grasp at the approaching trapeze. For it is always easier to fling the arm forward than to draw it back; and whereas too short a stroke will merely cause the performer to come to the ground, a casualty for which he is always prepared, an overshot stroke will assuredly break one arm if not both, and with the unfortunate gymnast on his head or flat on his back.

There is this remarkable feature in muscular, as indeed in literary and all other productions, that the inexperienced public invariably mistakes the important points. They appreciate the really difficult part of the performance, and reserve their real applause for the simplest and easiest, but the most showy, feature. To use a theatrical term, to speak feelingly: for I have often exhibited before select assemblies, and have invariably found that nobody fulfilled subscription, or even applauded, passed over, while easy but dashing feats, such as throwing a somersault, and catching the trapeze from a trapeze and catching by the feet, are rewarded with loud cheers. So it is with the performer of the many-trapeze act: he may have followed in the track of Leotard, the great master of his art. It is no very difficult matter to pass from one trapeze to another. It requires a certain dash and courage, but not more than a thorough course of gymnastics can strengthen any man to perform the difficulty being, of course, in exact proportion to the distance between the trapezes. The real trick lies in the first swing-off, and consists in the raising of the bar at the precise moment when the weight of the body is thrown on it, and in the proper direction, and in the perfect line in which the body is "delivered" between the ropes.

It is not enough to swing high on the bar. Any one can do that who dares. The first great point is to catch it so as to preserve the original impetus, and to be able to fall fresh from what is gained, as is always the case before the trapezist can come to the end of the bar. The great difficulty for such a power is evident from the fact that if a leaden mass of the same weight as the performer were fastened to the ropes and swung from the elevated perch, it would not return to the point whence it started, owing to the resistance of the air (which feels to the performer like being whirled along on the outside of an express train) and the friction of the machinery on which it was suspended. The performer must therefore have a perfect command over the instrument, and be able to give to the inert mass of his body a motion which will serve to compensate for the loss of power. A thorough resistance of force, and for those not personally experienced this resistance can form the least idea of its intensity, of the fierce rush of the air as of a tornado, and the difficulty even to breath which it occasions to the neophyte.

The first somersault ever done, I learned by my lessons the arrangements were so exactly balanced that the loss of a pound's weight of force or the slightest miscalculation in the swing would produce inevitable and ignominious failure. After we had practised on the trapeze for some time, and were tolerably proficient in the simple swing-off to the single rope, without a bar for the hands, we erected a perpendicular bar in the middle of the building, had the rope thrown to us, and were able to catch the extremity of the bar, which had been stretched to their utmost. The first was to launch ourselves from the lighter, swing to the opposite bar, and there remain in the act of taking hold again, and resume our perch on the ladder. It is hardly possible to exaggerate the difficulty of this trick. The reader will observe that owing to the length of the rope, and the very limited space which intervened between the performer and the ground, it was necessary to gather up the body by the mere force of the arms, exactly in the spot where the stroke was made, and to throw the body to elongate gradually as it passed the centre of the swing, to have it round in the air at the end of the sway, there to "put on" force enough to return, and lastly to pass back to the ladder the process of gathering up the momentum, and of having to be again gone through. The force of the strain depends upon the position of the performer. If he has come to either end of the bar, there is a moment when he is suspended motionless in air, the body hung balanced by the hands and ropes. It is just that moment which is chosen for shifting from one side of the trapeze to the other, for turning in that air, or performing any trick. Should the performer loosen his hold at that instant he would fall to the ground from the point of the bar's swings toward the centre, the strain is gradually increased until it reaches the climax, just under the spot where the bar is suspended, and appearing to a novice as if it would tear his arms out of their sockets. It may be imagined, therefore, what pain have been the difficulties with the first rope, with which there was never more than an inch to grasp, and where the swinging of the body in such was sure to produce disastrous results. I have seen aspiring novices, whose ambition has overleaped their prudence, hang by the rope before they had subjected the muscles of the arms and loins to sufficient training, and so make of themselves a most pitiable example as a warning to the thoughtless. It is a very pleasant thing to perform the feat, to swing from the centre of the trapeze through the air, and the inward satisfaction of difficulties overcome. But it is not pleasant to the very last to leave the centre of the swing, to be jerked ignominiously along the earth for several yards in a series of spasms which it is impossible to be checked, but causing an excruciating rap to the side, and grinding to bits that portion of the frame which happens to be lowest. Neither is the slow pedal walk bestowed agreeable, nor is it very pleasant to be dragged by the knees, and in all companies, the natural use of a chair, and to be forced to rest in strange and ungainly attitudes until the pain of the first painful bruises can be healed.

A second important element in the proper management of the trapeze is, that the weight shall be thrown precisely on the centre. If the hands should grasp the bar on one side, or if the weight of the body should be thrown to the right or left, even by a single inch, the result is to force the trapeze out of the due line, and to put an insurmountable stop to the performance. A idle weight on a trapeze is every whit as powerful as a siding on a billiard-ball, and it is quite possible for a master of the art to swing himself on obstacle placed directly in his path, or even to steer his way between two objects that are only just sufficiently apart to admit the body to pass between them.

The third element of success in the exact timing of the swing, so that the hands may be caught just as it pleases itself for the return. Of course, if the performer should be too late, he is forced either to wait for another swing, or to throw a somersault, pass to the ground, and start afresh. But should he be too lucky and meet the bar as it comes on the ward him, the two opposing forces neutralize each other, a sharp stunning jerk ensues, and the performer either loses his hold and falls to the ground, or finds himself clutched in mid-career, all out of time, by his own arms and legs if they had been subjected to severe treatment on the rack.

There is not the least difficulty in passing from the trapeze to the rope—indeed, the real difficulties in the passage from the second to the third, and from the third to the fourth, became in order to believe that it is needful that the timing should be accurate as that of a chronometer, and the weight thrown precisely in the proper direction. I know few dispositions which sting so sharply at the time as "missing the trip" at this exercise. I am one in full swing, throwing every thing go like clock-work, your trapezes are swinging to perfection, you are in the very act of the stroke, you catch your bar just a trifle on one side, and away you go out of the line in a horribly ignominious manner, jerking violently along, and can not by any dexterity be metamorphosed into a victory. You can not conceal your misfortune by throwing a somersault, and leaving it to be meant it, because you are swinging diagonally, and a diagonal somersault is apt to become very unpleasant sensation about the hips, besides the great probability of flinging the unhappy performer on his back. You can not mend matters at the next trapeze, because your little circuit has lost the time, and you would be too late. So there you are, poised between heaven and earth, a mystery to yourself, and an object of derision to the spectators. We have certainly seen loud cheers for the error, and force himself again into the line before reaching the next trapeze, but the skill and energy required to do so are of such a nature that no man in a commanding master of the art would dare to attempt so hazardous a feat. It would be one that the error only tends to perpetuate itself. Just as a rifle-ball that misses a target by a few inches at a distance of a hundred yards would be likely to miss every one of a thousand, so an error of a foot at the first trapeze would be a yard at the second.

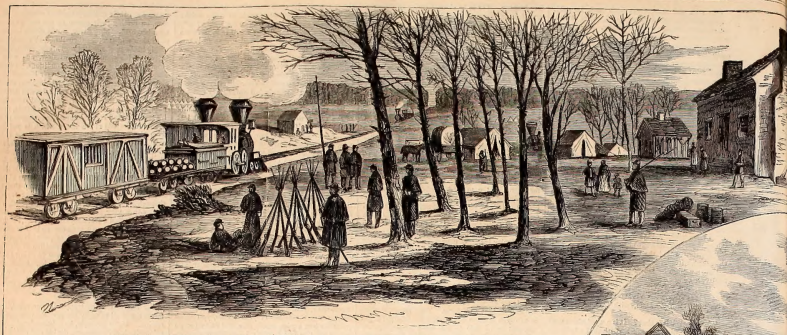
The effect of the second mistake, naturally, an error in point of time, is equally disagreeable. You meet the second trapeze too soon, and the fault is instantly makes itself felt by the blow of the bar against the hands, and the succeeding jerk, which causes to elongate the joints in the shoulders. Your feet get in advance of your hands; you make a frantic effort to recover the lost force, and miss at the next bar; you reach the little perch from which you started, and you flutter yourself that you have got managed to return to the starting-point. Vain hope! No sooner have your feet touched the perch, than you find that the impetus brings you on, right, than you gently tip over forward, and away you go again on a palpably bootless errand. There is no help for it but to let your plan is there to accept the position like a man, come to the ground, remount the perch, and start afresh.

The third error startles this trapeze. There is nothing like it in gymnastics for fascination or unfairness. The trapezist seizes his vocation with zeal and enlists them forever in its service, from which no deserters are allowed, against which no appeal ever rises. A know of few sensations more soul-stirring than the exultant feeling of freedom which you have through the air on returning through the air and hears the wind rush by. Then, to hurl one's self through space, to feel perfectly safe whether supported by the hands or legs, whether swinging at full length or gathered up into an undistinguishable bundle of arms and legs, is the most delightful of all bodily feeling. Accomplished swimmers partake of a similar feeling of elation when leaving some high rock, and, after a long dive, rolling billows raise their recumbent bodies aloft or lower them gently into the watery valley; but the trapezist has the whole air to wander around and sky above, and yet enjoying the sense that they are in perfect safety, and that they are masters of their element.

I have tried almost every gymnastic apparatus, including the flying trapeze and ropes, now unfashionably called by French titles, and am of opinion that the trapeze is conducive to them all for the peculiar strength that can be obtained in no other manner. Let a man, of whatever height, have performed the single trapeze for the first time, and set off swinging, or even allowed to hang motionless, and he will be bring his feet over his head, he will find the apparently simple task as practically impossible as jumping over the moon. He will be as helpless about like a drowning man, will get very red in the face, and make himself an altogether ridiculous object: every plunge will only serve to exhaust his failing powers, and in a very short time he will be forced to loosen his hold.

Now there are continually cases where the simple ability to raise the feet to the level of the hands, and to hang by the hands only, may save a man's life, and possibly through him the lives of many others. In modern houses the staircases are mere flesh-traps, and are built with a view to the purpose of leading the flames through the house in the quickest way, and effectually debarring the inmates from their ordinary mode of escape. Most men, on finding their egress by the stairs cut off by a body of rushing flame, would either leap out of window and fracture their limbs, or perish miserably in the smoke. But a gymnast will instinctively put his head out of window, and with a glance take in the surrounding conditions. Should there be a ledge, he will quickly lower himself by a rope extempore from sheets and blankets; should there be a window-ledge against which reach, he will descend as easily as down a ladder; or should there be a parapet above, he will seize it with his hands, draw his feet over, and escape in safety. Above all, at all events to the side of the house which is yet free from the flames. Or he can pass along a ledge only an inch in depth, by placing his hands and so transfer himself to a friendly spout, or traverse the wall until he finds a suitable place and mode to drop. Falling even such slight advantages as these he can suspend himself by his hands for an almost unlimited period, for the art of grasp that enables him to cling to the swift-moving trapeze through its wide swing renders the opposition of the body a very simple feat; and if at the same time he can find a resting-place for a foot, his perchance will be quite easy, even though the foot should be higher than his head. A trapezist is perfectly indifferent as to the relative position of his feet and head, having been accustomed to use both legs, instep, or even by a single leg hitched over the bar. He can rest comfortably for hours, or, at a sudden reversal of attitude, and in happily ignorant of the inconvenience caused by the blood rushing to the head.

For instruction the trapeze is unrivaled, as it forces the pupil to apply his powers in the proper direction. If, for example, he is being taught to develop his chest by grasping the bar and lifting himself until his chin is above the bar, he can not effect the feat by a jerk or a swing, as on a fixed bar, but must do it by the steady and gradual power the trapeze swings away and balks the irregular attempt. If, again, the loins and abdominal muscles are to be developed, the pupil sets to work to line himself by vain plunges with his legs, for no sooner does he push his feet forward than he sets the trapeze in motion in a circular field of swing, and down come his feet to the ground.



When once the course of instruction has been completed, and the gymnast feels himself fairly at home on his bar, he may be assured that he has attained the point at which he may be said fearful, and the branch of which he will never lose. Even when he has passed the best of the muscular powers brought on by increasing years and a sedentary life, the power remains, though its exercise is not so easy as in the days of youth, and the spirit of the bar produces unpleasant stiffness the next morning. I, who write, have learned this first from practical experience, for the space of many years after I was debarred from gymnastic exercises, and never even had the opportunity except at a distance, of returning into country life, I hung an extemporized trapeze on the branch of a tree, and was surprised to find that I could swing myself as far in the days of yore, though with a little more expenditure of muscle, and not swing quite so high with the perfect confidence, and fling myself to the ground by a backward somersault with ease and certainty. Of course I made no attempt to perform the feat, as sedentary pupils should be taught to perform the daring and difficult feats which are achieved by professional acrobats, whose whole lives are devoted to muscular development. But a good steady working trapeze is a luxury for the man of sedentary habit, and the intellect is not only more enduring, but is keener and brighter when the body is in thoroughly healthy order. Many a man of medium fills to the lot of those whose work is of the brain tonely sort would find in the hands the exercise that owes all his health to the course of gymnastics through which he passed.

GENERAL BANKS'S EXPEDITION.

On page 788 we give a fine illustration of the camp of General Banks, near Long Island, where a large portion of the forces which are to sail under the command of that officer have been assembling. Regiments have been or are still there; at one time there were something like 10,000 men in camp. The last accounts received were to the effect that of men were rather defective. Several regiments, from their unfortunate location, could not be compelled to camp out on the ground without shelter, tents, or protection of any kind against the wind and cold. But we have reason to hope that the exposure has produced any great increase of sickness among the troops. Indeed it is very seldom at one time after all. By the time these lines are read the camp on the Union Course may be vacated, and the troops on board the fleet in course of action. General Banks is working with untiring energy to complete his preparations and get into the field.

PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

We publish on page 789 a view of the city of PETERSBURG, Virginia, which is interesting at present as the base of operations against Richmond. Petersburg is a city of some 17,000 people, situated on the Appomattox River, and connected with Richmond by railroad via the James. It is twenty-three miles from Richmond, and in the event of a southern attack on the latter capital would become in some degree the key to the movement. Vessels of 100 tons can run up as far as Petersburg, and carry off large quantities of flour and tobacco. Before the war Petersburg was quite a thriving place, contained several manufactories, and did a large business. Since the war the other cities of Virginia, it has been ruined by the atrocious folly of the rebellion. The population, at present indications be reliable, it may yet see a darker day than it has hi

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

WE devote pages 792 and 793 to illustrations of the Army of the Potomac, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. A. R. Waud. Mr. Waud thus describes his pictures:

SCENES ON THE MARCH FROM WARRENTON TO FREDERICKSBURG.

The first sketch is a little street scene in the town of Warrenton, garnished with wagons, forage, soldiers, etc., the inhabitants remaining mostly out of sight.

From Warrenton the army moved toward Catlett's Station, near which place they encamped for the night. The iron wheels and other indestructible portions of railroad cars, as well as the charred remains of various things burned up by the rebels, show traces of Stuart's visitation while Pope was falling back upon Washington.

A short distance from Catlett's is Cedar Run, over which the railroad passes on a trestle bridge, which appears to temporarily occupy the place of a once better structure destroyed at a previous period. Not much farther on is the junction of the Warrenton branch with the main line of railroad. This was quite a busy spot while the army lay to the west of it, and when the sketch was made was occupied by the Eleventh Massachusetts and other regiments, part of General Sickles's division.

After leaving Catlett's and Weaverville, a short distance from the former place, the troops crossed Cedar Run, and marched on toward Aquia and Falmouth. Burnside's head-quarters were expected to proceed to a locality called the Spotted Tavern; whether they ever got there, which I believe they did not, or even if such a place is in existence—seriously doubted by many—is uncertain. One thing, however, is certain: about half the officers got lost (in spite of much careful study devoted to the maps of the period), bringing up at all sorts of places in search of quarters till returning day should enable them to renew the search for the lost camp of head-quarters.

It is rather comical to notice the rapidity with which neighboring rail-fences are demolished when a halt is ordered. The men directly organize a rail brigade—a kind of rail-ery not at all relished by the unfortunate natives whose fences make such desirable fuel, being cut and dried for the purpose.

From Falmouth we got the first view of Fredericksburg, which I presume has been often described before. It is a deserted-looking place; the church clock, however, sounds the hour regularly—a strange, familiar sound. The rebel pickets line one bank of the river, ours the other. In the streets of the city they can be seen lounging about, although they do not seem to have that curiosity about us which we manifest toward them. On one of the houses an English flag (the cross of St. George) is flying, and in the country beyond the smoke of the camps shows that a large force is there.

UNION AND REBEL SOLDIERS ON OPPOSITE SIDES OF THE BURNED RAILWAY BRIDGE.

This is a favorite spot for the soldiers of either army to meet within speaking distance and exchange remarks, frequently of an uncomplimentary character. Proposals for all sorts of exchanges (impossible of accomplishment) are made—such as offers to barter coffee or tea for whisky or tobacco, gray coats for blue ones—the rebels walking about in the clothes they have taken from Uncle Sam's men prompting the proposal. The seceshers show a laudable anxiety to get New York papers for Richmond publications; a number of them have asked after their Commissary and Quarter-master (meaning Pope and M'Dowell), and they generally express a belief that they "will whack the Union army now M'Clellan is gone." To their inquiry of our men, "How do you like Bull Run?" they receive for answer, "What do you think of South Mountain?" Some witty remarks are made on both sides, but it usually ends in a general blackguarding. One of them told a Zouave that they should shortly come over to look after us. "Yes," he answered; "so you will, under a guard."

GENERAL BURNSIDE AND HIS MARSHALS.

WE publish on page 785 a portrait of GENERAL BURNSIDE, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Potomac, of the Commanders of the three Grand Divisions, GENERALS HOOKER, SUMNER, and FRANKLIN; and of the Chief of the Reserve, GENERAL SIGEL. All are from portraits by Brady.

Of Major-General Burnside we published a very full biographical sketch only two weeks ago. We need only append here the following anecdote which we find in the Evening Post:

THE SECRETARY AND THE SOLDIERS.

It is about twenty years since one of the members of the present Cabinet was a member of Congress from a distant Western State. He had the usual right of designating a single candidate for admission to the West Point Military Academy. The applications made to him for a vacancy which then existed were not many, but among them was a letter from a boy of sixteen or seventeen years of age, who, without any accompanying recommendations or references, asked the appointment for himself. The member dismissed the appeal from his mind, with perhaps a passing thought of the forwardness and impudence of the stripling who could aspire to such a place on no other grounds than his own desire to get a good education at the public expense.

But happening a short time afterward to be in the little village whence the letter was mailed, the incident was recalled to his memory, and he thought he would beguile the few hours of leisure that he had by looking up the ambitious youth. He made his way, by dint of much inquiry, to a small tailor's shop on the outskirts of the town, and when he was admitted at the door he found a lad sitting cross-legged upon the tailor's bench, mending a rent in an old pair of pantaloons. But this lad had another occupation besides his manual toil. Near by, on a small block of wood, rested a book of abstruse science, to which he turned his eyes whenever they could be transferred from the work in his hands. The member accosted him by the name given in the letter, and the lad replied "I am the person." "You wish, then, to be appointed a cadet at West Point?" "I do," he rejoined. "Why?" asked the Congressman. "Because," answered the tailor youth, "I feel that I was born for something better than mending old clothes." The member talked further with him, and was so pleased with his frankness, his spirit, and the rare intelligence he evinced that he procured him the appointment.

The member is now Secretary Smith, of Indiana, and the youth General Burnside, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Potomac. We should not be surprised if that boy—an excellent specimen of our Northern mud-sills—were destined to hoist the American flag to its old place on the Capitol at Richmond.

The following sketches will introduce the other Generals to the reader:

GENERAL HOOKER.

Major-General Joseph Hooker was born in Massachusetts about the year 1817, and is consequently about forty-five years of age. He entered West Point in 1833, and graduated in 1837, standing No. 28 in a class which included Generals Benham, Williams, Sedgwick, etc., of the Union army, and Generals Bragg, Mackall, and Early of the rebel forces. At the outbreak of the war with Mexico he accompanied Brigadier-General Hamer as Aid-de-camp, and was brevetted Captain for gallant conduct in several conflicts at Monterey. In March, 1847, he was appointed Assistant Adjutant-General, with the rank of Captain. At the National Bridge he distinguished himself, and was brevetted Major; and at Chapultepec he again attracted attention by his gallant and meritorious conduct, and was brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel.

At the close of the war with Mexico he withdrew from the service, and soon afterward emigrated to California. The outbreak of the rebellion found him there, and he was one of the first of the old West Pointers who offered his services to the Government. He was one of the first batch of Brigadier-Generals of Volunteers appointed by President Lincoln on 17th May, 1861; and was, on his arrival, placed in command of a brigade of the army of the Potomac, and subsequently of a division. From July, 1861, to February, 1862, he was stationed in Southern Maryland, on the north shore of the Potomac, his duty being to prevent the rebels crossing the river, and to amuse them with their river blockade while M'Clellan was getting his army into trim. This difficult duty he performed admirably.

When the army of the Potomac moved to the Peninsula, Hooker accompanied them in charge of a division. In the contest at Williamsburg his division bravely stood the brunt of the battle, the men of the Excelsior Brigade actually being mowed down as they stood up in line. At Fair Oaks the men again showed their valor, and the General his fighting qualities. In the various minor contests Hooker took his part and bravely went through with his share of the seven days' fights. When M'Clellan's army was placed under the command of General Pope, we find the names of "Fighting Joe Hooker" and the late General Kearney mentioned together in the thickest of the struggle; and at South Mountain and Sharpsburg he seems to have been second to no one. At the latter fight he was shot through the foot and obliged to leave the field; but for this accident, he thinks he would have driven the rebels into the Potomac. On his recovery he was appointed to the command of the Centre Grand Division of the army of the Potomac, and he is now in that command.

GENERAL SUMNER.

General Edwin V. Sumner, commanding the Right Grand Division of the army of the Potomac, was born in Massachusetts, about the year 1797, and was appointed to West Point, from New York, in 1815. He served in the infantry for eighteen years; in 1833 he was appointed Captain of Dragoons, and Major in 1846. He served in the Mexican war, and was brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel for gallant and meritorious conduct at Cerro Gordo; and Colonel for the same behavior at Molino del Rey. In 1848 he was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of the First Dragoons. When the troubles broke out in Kansas a force of cavalry was sent to preserve the peace, and Colonel Sumner was placed in command. He discharged the delicate duties of his office with skill and success. On the election of Mr. Lincoln he was one of the four officers (Generals Pope and Hunter being two of the remainder) who were appointed by the War Department to escort the President-elect to Washington. The famous night-journey through Baltimore, which was undertaken in order to frustrate a plot for the assassination of the President, was resolved upon, against his counsels and in spite of his entreaties. After the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln Colonel Sumner was appointed to supersede General Albert S. Johnson (who turned rebel) in command of our force on the Pacific. He speedily set matters straight in that section of the country, and returned home, signalizing his return by the arrest of the traitor Gwin, of California, on the way. The authorities of New Granada attempted to prevent the passage of Gwin as a prisoner through their territory; but Sumner took the responsibility, and marched him across the Isthmus with a battalion of United States troops. On his arrival at Washington General Sumner was appointed to the command, first of a division and next of a corps in General M'Clellan's army. His conduct at Williamsburg has been the subject of much criticism, but at Fair Oaks he certainly vindicated his reputation for good soldiership and gallantry.

He has lately been appointed to the command of the Right Grand Division of the army of the Potomac, and led the advance on the march toward Fredericksburg.

GENERAL FRANKLIN.

William Benjamin Franklin was born in Pennsylvania about the year 1821, and entered West Point in 1839. He graduated at the head of his class in 1843; being a classmate of Ulysses S. Grant, Reynolds, Augur, etc. On the 1st of July, 1843, he was appointed a Brevet Second Lieutenant of Topographical Engineers, and on the 21st of September, 1846, received his full commission. He served in Mexico, and was brevetted First Lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct at Buena Vista, dating from February 23, 1847. This brevet was awarded in May, 1848. From July 1848 to 1850 he was Acting Assistant Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy at the Military Academy at West Point. He was next placed on light-house duty, to which he was appointed in January, 1853. He received his full commission of First Lieutenant in March, 1853, and Captain on the 1st of July, 1857. In the Army Register for 1859 he was the junior captain but one in the corps, and in that of 1860 last but two. In the register for 1861 his name stands two degrees higher on the roll, there being four captains his junior. On the 14th of May, 1861, he was appointed to the colonelcy of the Twelfth United States Infantry, one of the new regular regiments organized at the commencement of the rebellion. With this rank he had charge of the first brigade of the third division of General M'Dowell's army at Bull Run.

He was appointed a Brigadier-General in July, and, on the reorganization of the army, was given the command of a division consisting of the brigades of Slocum, Kearney, and Newton, which afterward became the first division of the first army corps commanded by M'Dowell. When M'Dowell was directed to remain at Fredericksburg, Franklin was detached and sent to M'Clellan on the peninsula. No officer won higher distinction than he in the memorable contests on the march to Richmond, and as a reward for his gallantry he was appointed to the command of an army corps with the rank of Major-General of Volunteers. He won fresh laurels at the battles of South Mountain and Sharpsburg, and on the appointment of Burnside to the command of the army he was selected to command the Left Grand Division. He was considered by General M'Clellan one of his finest officers.

GENERAL SIGEL.

Major-General Franz Sigel was born at Baden, in Germany, in 1824, and is consequently thirty-eight years of age at the present time. He was educated at the military school at Carlsruhe, closed his course with honors, and obtained a high position in the army of his country. In the year 1847 he was esteemed by his brother officers the most scientific artillerist in Germany. When the rebellion broke out he took sides with the insurgents, lost his commission, and took service with the popular party. At one time he was in chief command of the popular army, and managed by a skillful retreat, in which he led away 30,000 men from a pursuing army of 80,000, and saved all his guns and trains, to elicit the warm eulogiums of the oldest soldiers in Europe. At the overthrow of the rebellion Sigel emigrated to this country.

Here he engaged in teaching, and fairly settled down to the dull life of a professor, and married the daughter of the principal of his academy. About the year 1858 he obtained a position in a college at St. Louis, and removed thither. When the rebellion broke out he tendered his services to the Government, and was given the command of the 2d Regiment of Union Volunteers, raised in St. Louis. He was soon appointed Brigadier-General, and accompanied General Lyon on his famous campaign against Price. At the battle of Springfield, where Lyon was killed, Sigel succeeded to the command, and withdrew our little army with skill and success. He subsequently commanded a corps throughout the bloodless campaign under Frémont; and when General Curtis was detached to operate in Arkansas, Sigel led one of his divisions. It is understood that he planned and won the great battle of Pea Ridge almost against the wishes of his superior, General Curtis. After the battle some difficulty about commands arose, and Sigel was called to Washington and given the command of Harper's Ferry. On the organization of the Army of Virginia a place was created for him by the resignation of General Fremont, and he accordingly took command of his army corps. In all the terrible battles which Pope fought in order to delay the advance of Lee against Washington Sigel took an active part. At the Rappahannock his cannon incessantly thundered; and though the enemy outnumbered him by at least five to one, he held them at bay until M'Clellan's army arrived at Washington. When the Army of Virginia was merged into the Army of the Potomac Sigel was given the command of the Twelfth Army Corps, which he retained until General Burnside was appointed to command the Army of the Potomac. He was then given charge of the Reserves, and specially intrusted with the duty of watching Jackson.

A LETTER FROM THE COUNTRY.

Tu the Edditer ov Harper's Weekly:

DEER MR. EDDITER,—Here I am, seeted in my roking-cheer by the winder, a gazin aout on the face ov natchur, which is a verry plesant okkerpashun ov mine. Tu speck es a poit,

> The sun is lookin red,
> With his brod beems overhed,
> A spreddin himself like a peekok's tale, fur skorn;
> And the branches ov the trees
> Air a sqwingin in the breese

And the vue frum my winder is butiful—butiful!

But tho' I am a wooman I am no less an Administratrix, and it makes me mad tu heer peeple say wimmen don't know nawthin abaout pollytiks; but I tell yeou, Mr. Edditer, es a ginerul thing, thay air a plagey site smarter then the menfokes be, and ef we kood vote I gess sum pollytishuns that I kood menshun wood hev tu kum daown aout ov thare high-heeled boots mity qwick!

Bruther-in-law Stevens is wun ov 'em. He's marrid tu my sister Sophy (aour kat was named arter her), and the deer knows what she took him for! I'm shure it warn't fur his buty, fur he's es homely es a hedge-fense; nor was it his goodness, fur his temper is es kross and es krukid es an apple-tree bow.

He thinks thare aint nawthin like the Inglish. So du I, fur thet matter; fur thay're the meenest kritters under the sun, takin 'em es a nashun—but he thinks thay air perfeckshun.

It's Ingland here, and Ingland thare, till I wish tu goodness he was an Inglishmun and in his native kuntry!

What provokes me most is, Sophy awlways sides with her husband.

He was bostin the uther day abaout Ingland's "nutrality" in aour war, and haow the paper kalled Punch (a dretful intemperrit name fur a noospaper) sed a little while ago thet "Ingland was reely romantick in keepin nutral betwixt the Nawth and Saouth"—and sich like nonsensikal langwidge; and Sophy got so exsited abaout it that she up and cheered fur Qween Victory!

I sot rite daown tu my desk and rit the follerin effushun:

Steve was orful mad, and thretened tu draown my Sophy (the kat, ov kourse); jest think ov thet! But I told him planely thet ef he tutched my kat I'd give him jessie pritty middlin qwick!

He immejitly subsidid.

Thet puts me in mind when the Prince ov Wails was heer Steve and Sophy, bein strong dimmykrats, were krasy tu see him. Thay akkordingly started daown tu Bostin wun raney day, but thay didn't git a single site ov the Prince, bekawse he'd left taown the day before.

Well, Cousin Sam Bailey, whare thay was vistin, is reel cute, and unbeknown tu enny wun he kut orf a lock ov his own hare, and giv it tu Sophy, awl rapped up in sentid paper, which yu kood smell harf a mile orf, marked,

"A lock ov hare frum the Prince of Wails's hed."

She was so delitid she maid her husbund buy a big brass locket tu keep it in, and wore it fur a watch a yeer and a harf, till wun day Sam told her ov it when we was awl toogether, and it riled her so she haint spoke tu his fokes sense.

We hed a grate konsert the uther nite in aour taown fur the bennefit ov a yung man whu wants tu vollunteer fur a kommishun tu go tu the war. He kant go es a privit, bekawse he don't kno mutch abaout milliterry tacktjicks, and his fokes air afrade he wood shute sumbuddy he hadn't ort tu in thet kapassity.

So in awder tu git up lots ov simpathy fur him, tu petishun the Guvernur, thay got up this konsert, threu the influense ov sum ov the wimmen whu belong tu the solgers' Insanity Kommittee.

ALICE BANKGROVE'S SOLDIER.

THE gnarled old veteran of an apple-tree that overhung Squire Bankgrove's red brick house was tossing its boughs of pink-streaked apples to and fro in the September sunset; the level beams looked straight into the deserted robin's nest in its mossy fork; and Alice Bankgrove stood in the door-way shading her eyes with a pretty, sun-embrowned hand, and looking the while, as the western light, sifting through a canopy of moving leaves, covered her with narrow lines and zigzags of tremulous gold, like a bird peeping through the gilded wires of its cage!

"Home already, boys!" she called out, as the garden gate swung on its creaking hinges, and the hazel eyes flashed a sunny welcome down the path.

Boys, indeed! The boys whom Miss Alice apostrophized so patronizingly, were two stalwart fellows, either of whom could have picked the young lady up with one hand—handsome, olive-cheeked young giants, with the strength and symmetry of Hercules in their thews and sinews, as might have testified the shining heaps of newly-threshed grain they had left piled on the floor of the echoing, fragrant old barn under the hill!

"But why do you look so serious?" she added, the next minute. Ah, what curve of the lip, what quiver of the brow ever escaped a woman's quick eye? She read the two faces as if they had been open books.

"We have been talking, Alice," said the younger, a dark, open-browed young man of about twenty, leaning up against the door-way. "I am going to ask your father to get another hand to finish off this fall's work."

Alice stood in astonishment.

"What for, Harry? Irad hasn't been teasing you again, has he?"

Harry Moore burst into a great, mellow laugh.

"As if Irad's nonsense ever seriously annoyed me! No, Alice—the truth of the matter is that I feel like a fool threshing wheat here, when I ought to be standing in the ranks with a musket on my shoulder, fighting for the Stars and Stripes as my grandfather fought at Lexington and Bunker Hill!"

And as he spoke his dark eyes sparkled with inward fire, and a flush came on his sun-burned cheek.

"Hear him talk!" said Irad Curtis, shrugging his shoulders. "All moonshine, say I. Time enough to fight for the old flag when the old flag hasn't men enough to do its work, and sends word for Hal Moore and Irad Curtis to come along and lend a hand. Meanwhile, let every man mind his own business—that's my maxim!"

"I shall not wait for any such message," returned Moore, quietly. "I mean to be off, straightway—that is, Alice, if you think I'm doing right."

"I would volunteer to-morrow, if I were a man!" said Alice, instinctively clasping her hands together, and drawing a deep breath. Moore's face lighted up.

"That's enough, Alice!" said he.

Irad Curtis, standing in the shadow of the old apple-tree, quietly watched the two faces beyond with half-closed, vigilant eyes and a disagreeable curve to his lip.

"Wonder what Squire Bankgrove will say to all this," was his internal comment. "If he really means to give his daughter to a farm-hand, I don't see why my chances—with a little management—are not as good as Harry Moore's. She don't exactly like me; but if Harry really is in earnest about this volunteering business, it's the most obliging thing he could do just now. Once give me a clear field, and—"

Irad Curtis set his lips closely together as he entered the wide, cool hall where Squire Bankgrove—a hale, portly personage of about fifty, with ruddy cheeks, and locks thickly sprinkled with silver—sat in his elbow-chair, dozing over the newspaper.

Harry Moore walked straight up to him and broached the subject without unnecessary circumlocution.

"Squire Bankgrove, could you make it convenient to dispense with my services on the farm?"

"Well, I don't know," said the Squire, who was a man of reflection, and seldom committed himself without first consulting his snuff-box and his red silk pocket-handkerchief. Are you thinking of leaving me? I've no fault to find with you, Harry Moore!"

"Thank you, Sir. But I have made up my mind now that every young man's place is in the ranks of his country's defenders. And so, Sir, I shall enlist to-morrow!"

Squire Bankgrove brought down his clenched fist on the window-seat with a force that made the blackbird start in its wicker cage.

"Well said, my boy! I wish I was ten years younger, and I'd go 'long with you myself!"

"I am glad you approve it, Sir."

"Approve it, Harry! I don't do nothin' else!" cried the Squire, entirely heedless of the memory of Lindley Murray in his enthusiasm. "And when you come back, Harry, after you've done a man's duty on the battle-field—for you will come back—"

"Don't, father!" interposed Mrs. Bankgrove, who was wiping her spectacles very hard; "don't go to temptin' Providence that way!"

"Wife," said the old man, solemnly, "he will come back! Shall not the LORD of Battles be with him? As I was sayin', Harry, when that day arrives—"

"Then, Sir," said Harry, "will you consent to give me your daughter?"

He had spoken from a sudden impulse the words he would never have dared to utter under ordinary circumstances. No recalling them now, however, and Alice blushed redder than the reddest hollyhock by the garden wall! Squire Bankgrove opened his eyes wide, and slowly rubbed his nose, looking the while from Alice to Harry and back again.

"Well, I'm free to confess I hadn't thought o' that," said the Squire. "But, Harry Moore, you're made o' the right mettle, and I've always found you true to the back-bone. Yes; if Alice hain't no objections, you shall have her when you come back again."

And thus it happened that when Harry Moore went away to the wars a lock of Alice Bankgrove's silky hair lay upon his manly heart, and stirred to the music of its strong beatings.

"Whew-w-w!" whistled Irad Curtis, as he worked all alone in the perfumed silence of the old red barn; "I didn't suppose the affair would turn out precisely as it has done; but no matter—things may happen just right after all!"

And Irad Curtis was not a whit disheartened at the cool politeness with which Alice Bankgrove put aside the innumerable little courtesies he strove to render toward her all that fall—not he! There was a good deal of dogged perseverance ingrain to the nature of Irad Curtis.

The year glided away in sun and shower—blossoming roses and dreary falls of snow—and once again the harvest-moon hung like a shield of ruddy silver over the quiet old homestead, with its red barn and its cluster of gnarled apple-trees. But in the west the sun had set with wild, ensanguined splendor, amidst clouds whose crimson dyes seemed like a sea of blood. And Alice Bankgrove, sitting at her window, thinking of the dreadful rumors of battle that floated dimly into the country solitudes, could not bear to look at the blazing horizon, so nervous had she grown.

Suddenly a clear bugle-sound rang out amidst the dewy hollows, dying away with pathetic cadences in the woods, where a score of whip-poor-wills were moaning their sad refrain.

"There! the stage has passed by, and the mail is in!" exclaimed Alice, springing to her feet. "Papa, may I go down to the post-office?—it is only a little way!"

"It's a mile, child, and more, and the dew is falling," said the practical Squire, looking up from a calculation he was making by the light of a tallow candle.

"Do let her go, father," said his wife, nudging his elbow; "don't you see how worried she feels? You was young yourself once!"

Alice scarcely waited for the permission ere she hurried away through the lonely woods, dew-dripping and full of faint, sweet fragrance.

"No letter for a week," she murmured to herself. "Perhaps it will come to-night—perhaps!"

"A letter for Alice Bankgrove? No, there is no such letter," said the gray-headed old postmaster, sorting over the pile of epistles in a leisurely way that was agony to poor, impatient Alice.

"No letter! are you sure?" repeated the young girl, leaning eagerly forward, with blanched cheek and throbbing heart.

"Sartin sure, Miss Alice—that is, as sure as a man can be of any thing in this onsartin world. Stay, though!" he added, as Alice was turning away with a thrill of sick despair; "here are some newspapers for Jeremiah Bankgrove, Esquare. That's your father, I guess."

Half an hour afterward Alice came into the sitting-room at home with slow, languid steps, and dew-drenched hair hanging carelessly about her shoulders. Irad Curtis sat by the table talking to her father. He rose and bowed.

"You have been to the post-office, Alice? Why didn't you let me go for you? I hope you have taken no cold."

"Did you get a letter, daughter?" said Mrs. Bankgrove, keenly scanning the girl's face.

"No letter," returned Alice, wearily. "Here are some newspapers for you, father."

She laid them on the table and went and sat on the broad door-stone, her cheek resting on one hand.

"No letter? that's strange!" said Irad, artfully. "Now if I was off to the wars, and had a sweet-heart, like somebody I know of, at home, I should write every day!"

"Pity you wasn't off to the wars, with a sweet-heart at home!" said the Squire, dryly; and Irad was silenced for the moment.

"Read us the news, Irad," said Mrs. Bankgrove. "The Squire's eyes ain't so young as they was, and he does make awful work readin' by candle-light."

"Yes, do, Irad," said the Squire, putting his spectacles back in their case with a sigh of relief; and Irad unfolded the teeming columns of the newspaper and began:

"Great Battle in Virginia!" he enunciated, reading very much as if the words had been printed in capitals. "List of the Killed and Wounded!"

"Read that, Irad!" said the Squire, leaning forward. Mrs. Bankgrove gave a quick glance toward the door, but Alice had vanished.

"It's pretty lengthy," said Irad, ruefully; "but here goes!"

Name after name he pronounced with slow, mechanical exactness, as if each were not shrined in some bleeding heart—wept over with everlasting tears!

"What!" shrieked the Squire, suddenly, as one well-known name knelled on his ear; "not in the list of killed?"

He started up, pale and trembling, with a cold dew on his forehead.

"Yes, it is," said Irad, himself rather dismayed. "Company E—that's his very Company; read for yourself, if you don't believe me!"

The Squire's dim eyes traced the fatal syllable in the doomed list, through a thick mist of blinding tears.

"Poor Alice! it will break her heart!" he said, in a husky tone. Mrs. Bankgrove gave a piercing cry, and sprang forward just in time to catch the sinking figure of Alice, who stood near the door, white and motionless as a spectre.

Dead! killed in battle! She could not believe it, though she repeated the words to herself mechanically a thousand times a day! Dead—in the bloom of his vigorous youth, and she living to mourn him! She scarce understood why people looked pityingly at her, and whispered one to another as she went by: she felt like one who walks in the mystery of a dreadful dream, and blindly trusts some day to waken from its awful shadow!

Dead! killed in battle!

The sad December blasts were moaning through the skeleton woods; the icicles tinkled, like tiny chimes of bells, at every rattle of the frozen boughs; the sunsets burned in orange flame along the west, and the nights, still and starry, were full of rimy frosts that cut almost like a knife in their biting keenness. And Alice Bankgrove, leaning sadly over the fire of crackling logs, wondered what dreary snows were folding their shroud over his unknown grave!

"Better go to bed, daughter, it is past ten," said the Squire, "and a stormy night. There's snow in the air, or I'm mistaken!"

"I will, by-and-by, father."

"Mrs. Bankgrove, wiser than her husband, quietly took up a candle, and beckoned him into the adjoining bedroom.

"Don't notice her, Jeremiah," said the mother, in a low voice. "She'll grieve it away in time if she's only let alone, poor child!"

"It's too consarned bad," said the Squire, the nearest approach, by-the-way, to profanity in which he ever indulged. "And to think of Irad Curtis comin' danglin' round to ask if I'd any objections to his comin' to see Alice Sunday nights. Objections! I let him know what I thought of his conduct. He won't come again in a hurry, I calculate!"

"There, there, father—hush!" said Mrs. Bankgrove, soothingly, "you'll disturb Alice."

And she closed the door as softly as if her daughter had been a sleeping infant whom she feared to arouse.

Alone, Alice sat there before the fire—alone with the ticking clock, and the bubbling drip of resin from the singing pine logs, and the wail of the tempest without, sadly pondering on the wintry blight that had come over her own young life. Almost before she knew it the old clock had chimed once and again, and the faint horn of the midnight stage, passing on its lonely way down in the hollow, floated indistinctly up to her ear—and still she mused on.

"Hallo there inside!" bawled Jonathan Starkey, the stage-driver, "who was it wanted to get out opposite Squire Bankgrove's house? This is the nearest we come to't. Just over the hill, Sir, and take the first road to your right—'tain't but a little way—and pitch-dark at that," he added, in an undertone, as he helped out a muffled figure; "sorry I can't drive you nearer, Sir—you seem to be lame."

Lame! If every bone in his body had been shattered the knowledge that he was within sight of Alice's home would have given him supernatural strength. How well he knew every turn of the road, even in the dense darkness of the stormy midnight—how familiarly the frozen ground answered to his footfalls!

Far out into the murky gloom streamed the ruddy brightness of that hearth-stone where she sat all alone. Could she but have known who was toiling to reach her through the night and tempest!

She never heard the faint, uncertain tap at the door, she never heard the click of the latch, but all of a sudden some mysterious influence bade her look up.

Great Heaven! it was her lover standing before her—pale, haggard, worn by pain and travel, but still her lover, and the next instant she lay sobbing on his breast.

"Oh, Harry, Harry Moore! They told me you were dead, but I knew it was false! I knew you would yet come back to me!"

And after he had told her of his well-nigh fatal wounds, his dreary captivity, and his final escape, she still sobbed through her tears,

"Oh, I knew, I knew you would come back!"

"Well, Harry, when are you going to take possession?" questioned the Squire, jocosely. "You know I promised you my daughter when you came back."

"As soon as possible, Sir," said Harry. "We have settled it all, Alice and I."

"Wife," said the Squire, "do you remember my saying under this very roof more than a year ago that I was sartin the Lord would bring Harry back to us; and haven't my words come true?"

He leaned forward and kissed away the tear that sparkled like a solitary diamond on his wife's withered cheek; for somehow the sight of the young people's happiness brought back his own honeymoon days.

And Irad Curtis remains a bachelor still!

THE GOVERNMENT HORSE.

I'M a Government hoss, your honor,
 With pedigree little to boast of;
But bought for the service, your honor,
 And hence to be reckoned the most of.

I claim not the lineage of Cruiser,
 Though I own to a family pride;
My "points" can be seen through and through, Sir,
 If you'll only examine my hide.

Though wretched I am, I have blushes
 For frauds that attend speculation—
Transactions whose villainy crushes
 The long-cherished hopes of the nation.

As I said, I'm a Government hoss,
 Though I wouldn't complain much of that, Sir;
"What's one man's gain is another's loss,"
 'Tis that which I wish to come at, Sir.

I was bought with a Treasury Note,
 At only five dollars and twenty;
And sold for a—('tis shameful to quote,
 'Twould seem as though money were plenty).

'Twas a wily contractor who did it,
 At a figure so low, do you see?
I'm sure it was much to his credit,
 Though all the loss credit to me.

Spavined and ringboned, glandered and blind,
 Wanting one really sound organ;
Some one was gouged—his pockets were lined,
 But I was a good enough MORGAN.

Ever compelled to stand to the rack—
 By my faith! I'm quite racked asunder;
For every sharp bone in my back
 Seems cracked with the weight of the plunder.

A cavalry charger they dubbed me—
 (A singular paradox, really!)—
'Tis the agent the charger that should be,
 I'm held as collateral merely.

Right few are the charges I've made, Sir,
 Upon the armed rebel bravado;
If ever I ambled that way, Sir,
 'Twas money that made the poor mare go.

And a sorry appearance I made
 In the genial land of Secesh!
But it taught them the tricks of the trade
 In our contracts for Northern horse-flesh.

Woe me! I'm a poor draught-horse at last!
 It's only my breath I can draw, Sir;
The life-current is ebbing quite fast,
 Like equity, justice, and law, Sir.

Yet I laugh when I think of the agents
 Selected to crush the rebellion—
To frighten the traitors with pageants
 Of grim Death astride a pale stallion;

And I watch the gaunt crows overhead,
 Each eagerly eying his ration,
Like hungry contractors fain to be fed—
 And muse on the fate of the nation.

Base contractors! army of leeches!
 I'd draft them to lead a forlorn hope;
Force them to march where equity reaches,
 And contracts are bound with a strong rope.

AN EGYPTIAN BALL.

I WAS asked to a fête at the villa of Count X——, an old resident of Alexandria, Egypt. The fête was especially interesting to me, as being composed almost exclusively of the foreign society of Alexandria, and notably of the Levantine element. Having paid our respects to the mistress of the house, we were placed on a sofa at the upper end of the chief reception room. As dancing had hardly commenced, we had time to look about us, and to note the guests who were still flocking in, and the ladies ranged in a circle round the room. These, to my disappointment, all wore ordinary European costume, which was neither fresh nor in good taste, nor gracefully worn; the only exception was in the instance of one little very old lady who sat in a bundle in the corner; in such a bundle that you could hardly tell in what fashion her dark silk dress was made, and could only distinguish that her head was covered with the silken skull-cap, bound round, turban-wise, with a small handkerchief, that forms the ordinary Levantine head-dress. But the younger women, when full dressed, dress their hair with elaborate complications, into which enter a quantity of natural flowers of every kind and hue.

I have been in many parts of the world. I have seen on their own ground all sorts of women, from the radiant daughters of "all the Howards" to the dusky North American squaws. But such fat women, and so many fat women, I never saw in any land as those Levantine ladies there assembled. Talk of Turkish women, fattened like crammed turkeys! The harems boast much flesh. You see in their narrow precincts many plump faces and redundant busts ill contained by the loose garment that covers them; many sturdy legs and pudsey hands. But what are all those beside the vast proportions of these "fat-fleshed" fair ones? While girls are yet in their teens the doom begins to fall on them. The commencement is far from objectionable. It is agreeable to see well-rounded arms and shoulders that you are "tempted to pat" at the so often lean ages of fifteen and sixteen. These are almost always accompanied by, item, a pair of long dark almond eyes, "put in with a dirty finger," as Lady Morgan writes; eyes that alternately flash and languish at the owner's command, and that are shaded by thick black straight brows, not unfrequently adopting the very doubtful item, dense heaps of black coarse wavy hair, that lies on the head and on the neck in the massive way you see depicted in old Egyptian paintings; and sometimes, though rarely, you see fine complexions.

——charm of married brows,

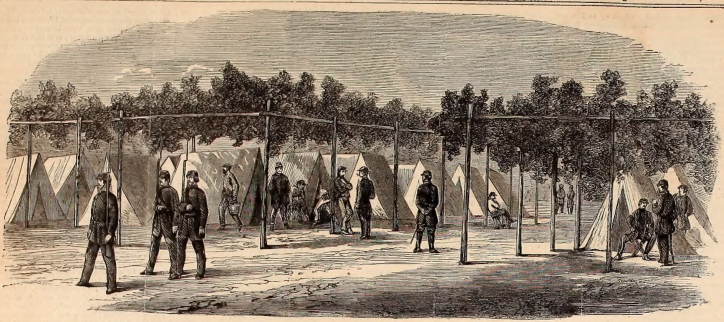
So far so good; except that these damsels look like comely matrons, or "fine girls" who have flirted through some ten or twelve seasons, and having as yet not found any of the first-class matches sufficiently appreciative of their charms, are becoming condescending, nay, even encouraging, to the second-class. But now turn to the mothers. We have just been rather admiring a plump short-necked damsel with bright eyes and rosy cheeks and dimpling smiles, looking like a cherubim prolonged. There is her mother sitting opposite—look on this picture and on that—and see the full-blown rose whose bud we have just been contemplating.

She can hardly be forty, and her smooth face yet bears traces of considerable comeliness. But the bright dark eyes are embedded in fat, the nose is sunk and lost in fat, the smiling mouth is buried in fat. Of neck there is no symptom: the head rests behind on a hump of fat; before, on a protuberance like the crop of a pouter pigeon. Her arms! Poor soul! Yet she does not seem to mind it; there she sits, smiling benignly, the picture of serene contentment; and, except that the frequent exercise of her fan hints that the "too solid flesh" does manifest a disposition to "melt" even in the pleasant and by no means high temperature of the spacious, airy, and not overcrowded rooms, her condition seems in no wise distressful to her.

I walked about the rooms. There was no regular supper, but fruits, cakes, ices, and other refreshments, abundantly intermingled with flowers, were laid out in one of them. A few of the men wore Eastern costume, but they were quite the exception. Some of the young Greeks—who showed none of the tendency to obesity so strongly developed in their mothers and sisters, but were generally spare, oval-faced, and olive-complexioned, and had heads of compact black frizzy hair like the women—seemed to dance rather well and to bear themselves correctly. Not so many of the damsels. I saw some convert the sober monotony of the uninteresting quadrille into a very jolly game nearly approaching to a romp. How they skipped and giggled, and swung hands and beckoned and gamboled, until their at first by no means fresh toilets became mere chiffons, and the flowers tumbled out of their hair, it boots not now to tell. Suffice it to say, that the presence of Mr. Turveydrop, with a few hints from that accomplished reflection of the first gentleman in Europe on the subject of Deportment, would have been remarkably apropos.

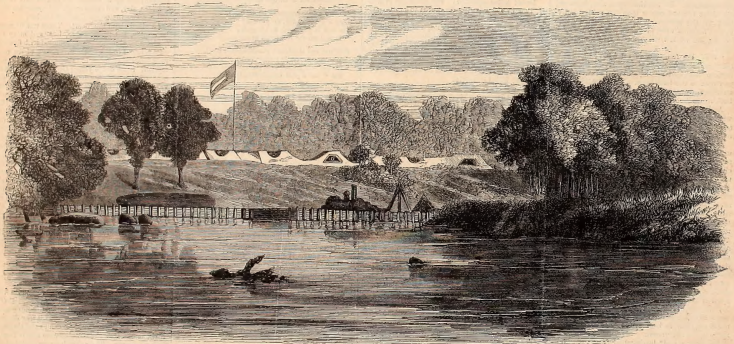
Soon after twelve the rooms began to thin a little, and we left at about half past, much amused with the evening's entertainment.

DRURY'S BLUFF.



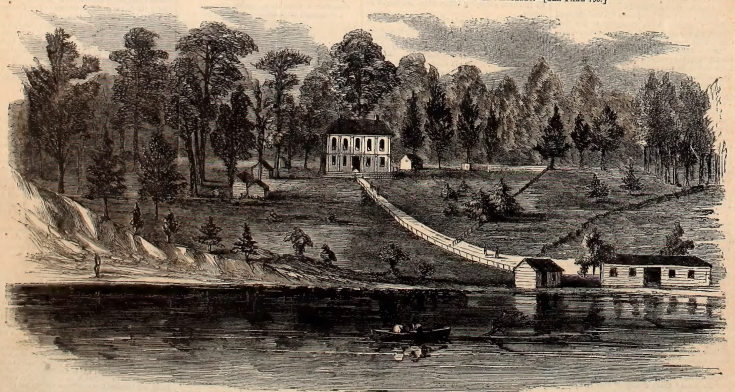
WE reproduce on page 796 two engravings from sketches by Mr. Vizetelly, the special artist of a London paper, who arrived in this country some months since, and contrived to find his way through our lines into the Confederate camps and thence to Richmond. How the sketches were sent to Europe does not appear. These sketches represent the Confederate fort and camp at Drury's Bluff, on the James River, eight miles from Richmond. At the North the fort is generally known as Fort Darling. It was this fort which was unsuccessfully attacked last summer by the Galena, Monitor, and part of the James River fleet. It is esteemed in Secessia a very strong position. Should we attack Richmond from the south or by the way of the river, we should have to carry it before we could approach the rebel capital. Rumor states that at least a part of the face of the work is iron plated.

SLIDELL'S HOUSE.



WE publish on page 796 a view of the rebel SLIDELL'S HOUSE, in Louisiana, from a sketch by Dr. Henry, of the United States Navy. The mansion and grounds are handsome, and display evidence of the wealth and taste of their proprietor. Just now, however, they are deserted; a few negroes, owing no allegiance to any one, roam through the grounds and shout their welcome to our gun-boats as they pass. This house, and that of the other chief conspirators against the nation, should be seized and occupied by our forces, and preserved as national property forever as a warning to traitors in after-time.

Of the fate of this and the other abandoned estates of the great planters the following extract from the Times correspondence furnishes the means of forming an opinion. Speaking of the Lafourche country, he says:



This district of country is one of the richest in agricultural wealth, not only in this State, but probably richest in some respects of any spot of the same size in the world. The wealth, however, consists almost entirely of sugar-plantations and negroes, but as time has rolled on the planters have, in long years of prosperity, by accretion, as it were, possessed themselves, in many instances, of a sort of barbaric splendor, illustrated by rich furniture and costly equipages. These things, with their large residences, in most instances, were precipitately abandoned the moment our forces defeated the enemy at Labadieville, and the consequence was that hundreds of negroes, besotted by the most severe system of slavery, were in a moment left to themselves; and in a delirium of excitement they first threw themselves, in an ecstasy of joy, on their knees, and "bressed God that Massa Linkum had come;" and then, as semi-civilized people would naturally do, they commenced indulging in all sorts of excesses, the first-fruits of their unrestricted liberty.

[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BEARD.]

THE NEW RECTOR OF TRINITY.

We publish herewith a portrait of REVEREND MORGAN L. DIX, the new Rector of Trinity Church, New York. Mr. Dix is a son of Major-General John A. Dix. He was born in New York about the year 1830, was educated at Columbia College, and entered the ministry on the completion of his studies. He was elected some years ago Assistant-Rector of Trinity, and was recommended by the late Dr. Berrian as the best man to succeed him. Mr. Dix is widely known as a faithful and laborious servant of Christ. He devotes his time and his means to the relief of the poor and afflicted, and among this class enjoys a popularity not surpassed by that of any other clergyman in the metropolis. His elevation to the rectorship of Trinity at his age foreshadows a great future for him in the Episcopal Church. Mr. DIX is an unmarried man.

I

FROM MISS GARTH TO MR. PENDRIL.

"WESTMOLAND HOUSE, JAN. 3, 1849.

DEAR MR. PENDRIL,—I write, as you kindly requested, to report how Norah is going on, and to tell you what changes I see for the better in the state of her mind on the subject of her sister.

"I can not say that she is becoming resigned to Magdalen's continued silence—I know her faithful nature too well to say it. I can only tell you that she is beginning to find relief from the heavy pressure of sorrow and suspense in new thoughts and new hopes. I doubt if she has yet realized this in her own mind; but I see the result, although she is not conscious of it herself. I see her heart opening to the consolation of another interest and another love. She has not said a word to me on the subject, nor have I said a word to her. But as certainly as I know that Mr. George Bartram's visits have lately grown more and more frequent to the family at Portland Place, so certainly I can assure you that Norah is finding a tried friend in her sorrow which is not of my bringing, and a hope in the future which I have not taught her to feel.

"It is needless for me to say that I tell you this in the strictest confidence. God knows whether the happy prospect which seems to me to be just dawning will grow brighter or not as time goes on. The oftener I see Mr. George Bartram—and he has called on me more than once—the stronger my liking for him grows. To my poor judgment he seems to be a gentleman, in the highest and truest sense of the word. If I could live to see Norah his wife, I should almost feel that I had lived long enough. But who can discern the future? We have suffered so much that I am afraid to hope.

"Have you heard any thing of Magdalen? I don't know why or how it is, but since I have known of her husband's death my old tenderness for her seems to cling to me more obstinately than ever.

"Always yours truly,

"HARRIET GARTH."

II.

FROM MR. PENDRIL TO MISS GARTH.

"SIZER ST., JAN. 4, 1849.

"MY DEAR MISS GARTH,—Of MRS. Noel Vanstone herself I have heard nothing. But I have learned since I saw you that the request of the physician in which she is left by the death of her husband may be depended on as the truth. She has given by any kind is bequeathed to her. Her name is not once mentioned in her husband's will.

"Knowing what we know, it is not to be concealed that this circumstance may threatens us with more embarrassment, and perhaps with more distress. MRS. Noel Vanstone is not the woman to submit without a desperate resistance to the total removal of all her schemes and all her hopes.

The mere fact that nothing whatever has been left to her since her husband's death is suggestive to my mind of serious mischief to come. In my present ignorance of her situation and with her unconcern where she is now the more inveterately I, for one, distrust her in the future. It is impossible to say to what violent measures her present extremity may not drive her. It is impossible to feel sure that she may not be the victim of some public scandal this time which may affect her innocent sister as well as herself.

"I know you will not misconstrue the motive which has led me to write these lines; I know you will not think that I am incumbering my letter to cause you unnecessary alarm. My sincere anxiety to see that happy prospect realized to which your letter alludes has caused me to feel far less reservedly than I might otherwise have written. I strongly urge you to use your influence, on every occasion when you can fairly exert it, to strengthen that growing attachment, and to place it beyond the reach of future family disasters, while you have the opportunity of doing so. When I tell you that the fortune of which MRS. Noel Vanstone has been deprived is entirely bequeathed to Admiral Bartram—and when I add that Mr. George Bartram is generally understood to be his uncle's heir—you will, I think, acknowledge that I am not warning you without a cause.

"Yours most truly,

"WILLIAM PENDRIL."

III.

FROM ADMIRAL BARTRAM TO MRS. DRAKE (HOUSEKEEPER AT ST. CRUX).

"ST. CRUX, Jan. 10, 1849.

"MRS. DRAKE,—I have received your letter from London, stating that you have found me a new parlor-maid at last, and that she will be ready to return with you to St. Crux, when your other errands in town allow you to come back.

"This arrangement must be altered immediately, for a reason which I am heartily sorry to have to write.

"The illness of my niece, MRS. Girdlestone—which appeared to be so slight as to alarm none of us, doctors included—has ended fatally. I received this morning the shocking news of her death. Her husband is said to be quite frantic with grief. Mr. George has gone down to his brother-in-law's to superintend the last melancholy duties, and I must follow him before the funeral takes place. We propose to take Mr. Girdlestone away afterward, and to try the effect on him of change of place and new scenes. Under these sad circumstances I may be absent from St. Crux a month or six weeks at least—the house will be shut up—and the new servant will not be wanted until my return.

"You will therefore tell the girl, on receiving this letter, that a death in the family has caused a temporary change in our arrangements. If she is willing to wait you may safely engage her to come here in six weeks' time—I shall be back by that time, I hope, at least. If she refuses, pay her what compensation is right, and so have done with her.

"Yours,

"ARTHUR BARTRAM."

IV.

FROM MRS. DRAKE TO ADMIRAL BARTRAM.

"JAN. 11.

"HONORED SIR,—I hope to get my errands done, and to return to St. Crux to-morrow, but write to ease you anxiety in case of delay.

"The young woman whom I have engaged (Louisa by name) is willing to wait your time; and her present mistress, taking an interest in her welfare, will provide for her during the interval. She understands that she is to enter on her new service in six weeks from the present date—namely, on the 25th of February next.

"Begging you will accept my respectful sympathy under the sad bereavement which has befallen the family,

"I remain, Honored Sir,

"Your humble servant,

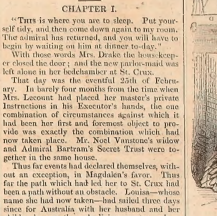
"SOPHIA DRAKE."

THE SEVENTH SCENE.

ST. CRUX-IN-THE-MARSH.

CHAPTER I.

"THUS is where you are to sleep. Put yourself tidy, and then come down again to my room. The admiral has returned, and you will have to begin by waiting on him at dinner to-day."



With these words MRS. Drake the house-keeper closed the door; and the new parlor-maid was left alone in her bedchamber at St. Crux.

That door was the eventful 25th of February. In barely four months from the time when MRS. Lecount had placed her master's private Instructions in his Executor's hands, the one combination of circumstances against which it had been her first and foremost object to provide was exactly the combination which had now taken place. MR. Noel Vanstone's widow and Admiral Bartram's Secret Trust were together in the same house.

Thus the events had declared themselves, without an exception, in Magdalen's favor. Thus far the path which had led her to St. Crux had been a path without an obstacle. Louisa—whose name she had now taken—had failed three days since for Monkhs with her husband and her child: she was the only living creature whom Magdalen had trusted with her secret, and she was at the extreme out of sight of the English land. The girl had been careful, reliable, and faithfully devoted to her mistress's interests to the last. She had passed the ordeal of her interview with the housekeeper, and had forgotten none of the instructions by which she had been prepared to meet it. She had herself proposed to turn the six weeks' delay, caused by the death in the admiral's family, to good account by continuing the all-important practice of those domestic lessons, on the perfect acquirement of which her mistress's daring stratagem depended for its success. Thanks to the time thus gained, the change of Louisa's name was over and the day of parting had come, Magdalen had learned and mastered, in the minute detail, every thing that her former servant could teach her. On the day when she passed the doors of St. Crux she entered on her desperate venture, strong in the ready presence of mind under emergencies which her later life had taught her—stronger still in the trained capacity that she possessed for the assumption of a character not her own—strongest of all in her two months' daily familiarity with the practical duties of the position which she had undertaken to fill.

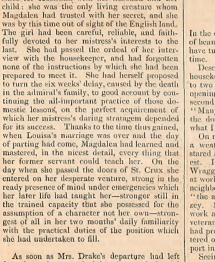
As soon as MRS. Drake's departure had left her alone she unpacked her box and dressed herself for the evening.

She put on a lavender-colored stuff gown—had arranged her MRS. Girdlestone's ordered for all the servants under the admiral's instructions—a white muslin apron, and a neat white cap and collar with ribbon to match the gown. In this servant's costume—in the plain gown fastening high round her neck, in the neat little white cap at the back of her head—in this simple dress, to the eyes of all men, not linen-drapers, at once the most modest and the most alluring that a woman can wear, the sad changes which mental suffering had wrought in her beauty almost disappeared from view. In the evening costume of a lady, with her bosom uncovered, with her dark hair unveiled, rather than dressed, in unpliable silk—the admiral might have passed her by without notice in his own drawing-room.

BEECH AND CARRIER.

In the evening costume of a servant no admirer of beauty could have looked at her once and not have turned again to look at her for the second time.

Descending the stairs, on her way to the housekeeper's room, she passed by the entrances to two long stone corridors, with rows of doors opening on them; one corridor situated on the second and one on the first floor of the house. "Many rooms!" she thought, as she looked at the doors. "Weary work, searching here for what I have come to find!"



On reaching the ground-floor she was met by a weather-beaten old man, who stopped and stared at her with an appearance of great interest. He was the same old man whom Captain Wragge had seen in the back-yard at St. Crux at work on the model of a ship. All round the neighborhood he was known, far and wide, as "the admiral's coxswain." His name was Mazzey. Sixty years had written their story of hard work at sea and hard drinking on shore on the veteran's grim and wrinkled face. Sixty years had proved his fidelity, and had brought his battered old carcass, at the end of the voyage, into port in his master's house.

Seeing no one else of whom she could inquire, Magdalen requested the old man to show her the way that led to the housekeeper's room.

"I'll show you, my dear," said old Mazzey, speaking in the high and hollow voice peculiar to the deaf. "You're the new maid—eh? And a fine-grown girl, too! His honor the admiral likes a parlor-maid with a clean pair fore and aft. You'll do, my dear—you'll do."

"You must not mind what Mr. Mazzey says to you," remarked the housekeeper, opening her door, as the old sailor expressed his approval of Magdalen in these terms. "He is privileged to talk as he pleases; and he is very tiresome and shocking in his habits—but he means no harm."

With that apology for the veteran MRS. Drake led Magdalen first to the pantry, and next to the linen-room, installing her with all due formality in her own domestic dominions. This ceremony completed the new parlor-maid was taken up stairs, and was shown the dining-room, which opened into a little corridor on the left hand. Here she was directed to lay the cloth, and to prepare the table for one person only, Mr. George Bartram not having returned with his uncle at St. Crux. Mrs. Drake's sharp eyes watched Magdalen attentively as she performed this introductory duty, and Mrs. Drake's private convictions, when the table was spread, forced her to acknowledge, so far, that the new servant thoroughly understood her work.

"WEST AND BY NOATIE, YOUR HONOR."

An hour later the soup-tureen was placed on the table, and Magdalen stood alone behind the admiral's empty chair, waiting her master's first suggestion of her when he entered the dining-room.

A large bell rang in the lower regions—quick, shambling footsteps pattered on the stone corridor outside—the door opened suddenly—and a tall, lean, gray-headed man, sharp as his eyes, shrewd as to his lips, fussily restless as to all his movements, entered the room, with two huge Labrador dogs at his heels, and took his seat at the table in a violent hurry. The dogs followed, and, placed themselves, with the utmost gravity and composure, one on each side of his chair. This was Admiral Bartram—and these were the companions of his solitary dinner.

"Ay! ay! ay! here's the new parlor-maid, to be sure!" he began, looking sharply, but not at all unkindly, at Magdalen. "What's your name, my good girl? Louisa, is it? I shall call you Lucy, if you don't mind. Take off the cover, my dear—I'm a minute or two late to-day. Don't be impatient to-morrow on that account; I am as regular as clock-work generally. Are you any the wiser for your journey? Did my spring-cart bump you about much in bringing you from Combo-Regis? Capital soup this—hot as fire—reminds me of the soup we used to have in the West Indies in the year Three. Here you are—your half-mourning on? Stand there and let me see. Ay, yes, very neat, and nice, and tidy. Mrs. Gridlestone's? Oh, my dear, dear, poor Mrs. Gridlestone! You're not afraid of dogs, are you, Lucy? Ah, I see you're not. Good dog! That's right! Always be kind to dumb animals. These two dogs dine with me every day, except when there's company. The dog on my left hand here is Bruiser, and the dog with the white nose is Cassius. Put you ever hear of the Roman Cassius were? Ancient Romans? That's right —good girl. Mind your book and your needle, and we'll get on like good husband and wife of these days. Take away the soup, my dear, take away the soup."

This was the man whose secret it was now the one interest of Magdalen's life to surprise! This was the man whose name had supplanted hers in Noel Vanstone's will!

The fish and the roast meat followed; and the admiral's table proceeded on—per the etiquette observed to the parlor-maid, and now dismissed to the dogs—as familiarly and as unceremoniously as ever. Magdalen observed, with some surprise, that the companions of the admiral's dinner had been received in a manner ranging from their master's plate. The two magnificent brutes sat squatted on their haunches, with their great heads over a chair, watching the progress of the meal with the profoundest attention, but apparently expecting no share in it. The roast meat was removed, the admiral's plate was changed, and Magdalen took the silver cover off the two small dishes on either side of the table. As she handed the first of the savory messes to her master the dogs suddenly exhibited a breathless personal interest in the proceedings. Bruiser gluttonously watered at the mouth; and the tongue of Cassius, disengaged in unutterable expectation, smoked again between his enormous jaws.

The admiral helped himself liberally from the dish, sent Magdalen to the side-table to get him some bread, and, when he thought he was well off him, furtively tumbled the whole contents of his plate into Bruiser's mouth. Cassius whined faintly as his fortunate companion received the savory mess at a gulp. "Hush! you fool," whispered the admiral. "Your turn next!"

Magdalen presented the second dish. Once more the old gentleman helped himself largely —once more he gave her away to the side-table —once more he tumbled the entire contents of the plate down the dog's throat, relieving Cassius this time. It became a confidential matter and an impartial man. When the next course followed—consisting of a plain pudding and an inchoherence "cream"—Magdalen's suspicion of the function of the dogs at the dinner-table was confirmed. While the master took the simple pudding the dogs swallowed the elaborate cream. The admiral was fairly tasked at offending his cook on the one hand, and offending his digestion on the other, and Bruiser and Cassius were the two trained companions who regularly helped him every day off the horns of his dilemma. "Very good? very good!" said the old gentleman, with the most transparent duplicity. "Tell the cook, my dear, a capital cream!"

Having placed the wine and dessert on the table, Magdalen was about to withdraw. Before she could leave the room her master called her back.

"Stop!" said the admiral. "You don't know the ways of the house yet, Lucy. Put another wine-glass here, at my right hand—the whisper was meant for my dear. I've got a third dog, who comes in at dessert—a drunken old fox-dog who has followed my fortunes afloat and ashore for fifty years and more. Yes, yes; that's the sort of glass we want. You're a good girl—you're a neat, handy girl. Steady, my dear! there's nothing to be frightened at!"

A sudden thump on the outside of the door, followed by low mingled barks from each of the dogs, had made Magdalen start. "Come in!" shouted the admiral. The door opened; the tails of Bruiser and Cassius cheerfully thumped the floor; and old Mr. Mazey marched straight up to the right-hand side of his master's chair. The veteran stood three inches over six feet high, and his balance carefully adjusted—as if the dining-room had been a cabin, and the house a ship, pitching in a sea-way.

The admiral filled the large glass with port, filled his own glass with claret, and raised it to his lips.

"God Bless the Queen, Mazey!" said the admiral.

"God bless the Queen, your honor," said old Mazey, swallowing his port, as the dogs swallowed the meat-dishes, at a gulp.

"How's the wind, Mazey?"

"West and by South, your honor."

"Any report to night, Mazey?"

"No report, your honor."

"Good-evening, Mazey."

"Good-evening, your honor."

The after-dinner ceremony was now completed, old Mazey marched back walked out of the room again. Bruiser and Cassius stretched themselves on the rug after their customary manner, and grunted in the lubricating heat of the fire. "For what we have received, the Lord make us truly thankful," said the admiral. "Go down stairs, my good girl, and get your supper. A light meal, Lucy, if you take my advice—a light meal or you will have the nightmare. Early to bed, my dear, and early to rise, makes a parlor-maid healthy and wealthy, and wise. That's the wisdom of your ancestors—you mustn't laugh at it. Good-night." In those words Magdalen was dismissed; and so her first day's experience of Admiral Bartram came to an end.

After breakfast, the next morning, the admiral's directions to the new parlor-maid included among their number the duty of waiting, in Magdalen's situation, it was especially her interest to receive. In case the old gentleman's nephew came home that day, on local business which took him to Ossory, she was directed to make herself responsible for showing the visitor into the study at the house, and to learn the position of the various rooms, so as to know where the bells called her when the bells rang. The day was to be charged with the duty of superintending the voyage of domestic discovery which Magdalen had, as yet, otherwise engaged—in which case any one of the inferior servants would be equally competent to act as Magdalen's deputy.

At noon the admiral left for Ossory, and Magdalen presented herself in Mrs. Drake's room to be shown over the house. Mrs. Drake appeared to be otherwise engaged, and referred her to the head housekeeper. The interview which happened on that particular morning to be in the same condition as Mrs. Drake, and referred her to the under-housekeeper. The under-housemaids declared that they were all behindhand, and had not a minute to spare—they suggested, not too civilly, that old Mazey was the only one on earth to do, and that he knew the house as well or better than the rats in it. Magdalen's temper took the hint with a secret indignation and contempt which it cost her a hard struggle to conceal. She had spoken to the old man once night, and she was certain now, that the women-servants all considered him as a privileged person among them, with the same sullen unanimity of distrust. Mrs. Drake, as she had seen for her self, was really engaged, and could not leave her accounts. But of all the servants under her who had made their excuses, not one had even attempted to be more civil than the rest. Further looks said plainly, "We don't like you, and we won't show you the house."

She found her way to old Mazey, not by the scanty directions given her, but by the sound of the veteran's loud and peculiar voice, singing, in some distant seclusion, a verse of the immortal sea-song of "Tom Bowling." It was also stopped among the rumbling stone passages on the basement story of the house, uncertain which way to turn next, by the same invisible old voice in the distance singing these lines:

"His form was of the manliest beau-ty-ute,
His heart was kind and soft,
Faithful below Tom did his duty,
But now he's gone aloft,
But now he's go-o-one aloft!"

Magdalen followed in the direction of the quavering notes, and found Mazey in a little room looking out on the back-yard. There sat old Mazey, with his spectacles low on his nose, and his knotty old hands blundering over the rigging of his model ship. There were Brutus and Cassius, sitting on the floor, side by side, and snoring as if they thoroughly enjoyed it. There was Lord Nelson on one wall, in framing watercolors; and on the other wall, in a large portrait, of Admiral Bartram's last flag-ship in full sail on a sea of ink, with a salmon-colored sky to complete the illusion.

"What! they won't show you over the house, won't they?" said old Mazey, at first sight. Then that head housemaid's a sour one, my dear, if ever there was a sour one. You're too young and good-looking to please 'em—that's what you are. He rose, took off his spectacles, and feebly mended the fire. "Come, my dear, I'll show you the house," said old Mazey, considering Magdalen's figure in drowsy soliloquy. "I say she's as straight as a spunyar; and his honor the admiral dotes on her too! Come along, my dear," he proceeded, addressing himself to Magdalen again. "I'll show you your Pints of the Compass first. When you know your Fives, blow high, blow low, you'll find it plain sailing all over the house."

He led the way to the door, stopped, and suddenly bethinking himself of his miniature ship, went back to put his model away in an empty cupboard—led the way to the door again—and then once more went back to look at some of the rooms were chilly—and pottered about, swearing and grumbling, and looking for his hat. Magdalen sat down patiently to wait for him. She gratefully contrasted his treatment of her with the treatment she had received from the women. Resist it as firmly, despise it as proudly as we may, all studied unkindness—no matter how contemptible it may be—has a stinging power in it which reaches the elder Magdalen only knew how she had felt the small malice of the female servants in the office and in the rough kindness of the old sailor produced on her afterward. The dumb welcome of the dogs, whom the movements in the room had roused them from their sleep, touched her more acutely still. Brutus pushed his mighty muzzle compassionately into her hand, and Cassius laid his friendly fore-paw on her lap. Her heart yearned over the two creatures as she patted and caressed them. It seemed only yesterday since she and the dogs at Combo-Raven had roamed the sands together, and now they were the summer mornings luxuriously on the hearth-hem.

Old Mazey found his hat at last, and they started on their exploring expedition, with the dogs after them.

Leaving the basement story of the house, which was entirely devoted to the servants' offices, they ascended to the first floor, and entered the long corridor, with which Magdalen's first night's experience as she potted, had made her acquainted. "Put your back agin this wall," said old Mazey, pointing to the long wall—opposite to the one which was pierced with doors, and ran out over a court-yard and fish-pond—which formed the right-hand side of the corridor. Magdalen set her back against the wall. "Put your back here," said the veteran, "and look straight afore you. What do you see?" "The opposite wall of the passage," said Magdalen. "Ay? ay! what else?" "The doors leading into the rooms." "What else?" "I see nothing else." Old Mazey chuckled, winked, and shook his knotty fore-finger at Magdalen. "You've missed one of the Fints of the Compass, my dear. When you've got your back agin this wall, and look straight afore you, you've got the Nonthe. If you ever get lost hereaway, put your back agin the wall, look out straight afore you, and you'll find it. I look Nonthe." "I see, so that like a good girl, and you won't lose your bearings."

After administering this preliminary dose of instruction, old Mazey opened the first of the doors on the right-hand side of the passage. It led into the dining-room, with which Magdalen was already familiar. The second room was fitted up as a library, and the third as a morning-room. The fourth and fifth doors—both belonging to bedrooms—were next opened, and both locked—brought them to the end of the North wing of the house, and to the opening of the passage which, as we have placed at a right angle to the first. Here old Mazey, who had divided his time pretty equally, during the investigation of the rooms, between looking "afore or the admiral," and whistling to the dogs, reversed with all his previous expedition to the points of the compass, and gravely directed Magdalen to repeat the ceremony of putting her back against the wall. She proceeded to shorten the proceedings by declaring (quite correctly) that in her present position she had the East on her right hand. "Don't you talk about the East, my dear," said old Mazey, proceeding unmoved with his own system of instruction, "till you know the East first. Put your back agin this wall, and look straight afore you. What do you see?" The answer to the question proceeded as before. When the end was reached, Magdalen was commanded. He chuckled again, and winked at her once more. "Now you may talk about the East, my dear," said the veteran, "for you've got it right."

The East passage, after leading them on for a few yards only, terminated in a vestibule, with a high door in it, which closed them as they advanced. The door admitted them to a large and lofty apartment, separated like the rest from the apartments, with valuable cid-fashioned furniture. Leading the way across this room, Magdalen's companion opened the door at the further end, and disclosed the door of entrance. "Put your apron over your head," said old Mazey. "We're coming to the Bankering Hall now. The floor's mortal cold, and the damp sticks to the soles like cobbler's pitch to a cobler. His honor the admiral calls it the Arctic Passage. I've got my name for it too. I call it Freeze-your-Nose."

Magdalen passed through the door-way, and found herself in the ancient banqueting hall of St. Crux.

On her left hand she saw a row of lofty windows, with the corresponding doors, all concealing over a frontage of more than a hundred feet in length. On her right hand, ranged in one long row from end to end of the opposite wall, were a dismal collection of black begrimed old pictures, resting their backs against the ice-cold, naked wall, and presenting battle-scenes by sea and land. Below the pictures, midway down the length of the wall, were the remains of a fire-place, surmounted by a towering mantle-piece of black marble. The fire-place (which was of such enormous size that it might be called) visible far or near in the vast emptiness of the place, was a gaunt ancient tripod of rusty iron bars, which looked as lonely in the middle of the hall, and supporting a wide circular pan filled deep with ashes from an extinct charcoal fire. The high ceiling, once finely carved and gilt, was foul with dirt and cobwebs; the naked walls at either end of the room were stained with damp; and the cold of the marble floor struck through the narrow strip of matting laid down, parallel with the windows, as a footpath for passengers across the wilderness of the hall. The entire scene—from the dreary fire-place devised than the name which old Mazey had found. "Freeze - your - Bones" accurately described, in three words, the character of the room in St. Crux.

"Do you never light a fire in this dismal place?" asked Magdalen.

It all depends on which side of Freeze-your-Bones his honor the admiral lives," said old Mazey. "His honor likes to shift his quarters, sometimes to one side of the house, sometimes to the other. If he lives South of Freeze-your-Bones—which is where you've just come from—we don't waste our coals here. If he lives South of Freeze-your-Bones—which is where we are going to next—we light the fire in the grate and the dismals in the pan. Every night when we do that the damp gets the better of us; every morning we turn to again and get the better of the damp."

With this remarkable explanation old Mazey led the way to the lower end of the Hall, opened three doors, and showed Magdalen, through another suit of rooms, four in number, all of moderate size, and all furnished and kept in the same manner as the rooms in the northern wing. She looked out of the windows, and saw the neglected garden of St. Crux overgrown with brambles and weeds. Here and there, at no great distance in the grounds, the smoothly-growing line of one of the tidal streams belonging to the locality wound its way, gleaming in the sunlight, through gaps in the bramble-and-tree. The more distant view ranged over the flat eastward country beyond, speckled with its scattered little villages; crossed and bounded by its net-work of "back-waters;" and terminated abruptly by the long, gray, solitary line of sea which protects the defenceless coast of Essex from invasion by the sea.

"Have we any more rooms still to see?" asked Magdalen, turning from the view of the garden, and looking about her for another door.

"No more, my dear—we've turned here, and we may as well wear round and put back again," said old Mazey. "Unless you want to go to the house—due south of you as you stand now —which is all fumbling about our ears. You mustn't go out into the garden if you want to see it; it's built off from us by a brick bulk-head, further side of this wall here. The monks lived in that part of the way, my dear, hundreds afore his honor the admiral was born or thought of, and a fine time they had of it! Pray to God, They sang in the church all the morning, and drank grog in the orchard all the afternoon. They shot at the rabbits with the arch-bishop's bow; and they fattened on the neighborhood all the year round. Lucky beggars! lucky beggars!"

Apostrophizing the monks in these terms, and apparently thinking that he had said all he himself in those good old times, the veteran led the way back through the rooms. On the return passage across the Freeze-your-Bones Hall Magdalen preceded him. "She's as straight as a poplar," mumbled old Mazey to himself, lobbying along after his youthful companion, and seeing his venerable head in cordial approval. "I never was partial to a young lass before myself—but I always did like 'em straight and free-grown, and I always shall like 'em straight and free-grown to the day I die."

"Are there more rooms to see up stairs, or have we done?" asked Magdalen, when the old man had returned to the point from which they had started.

The naturally clear, distinct tones of her voice had hitherto reached the old sailor's imperfect sense of hearing easily enough. Rather to her surprise he made some stone-dead answer, to her last question.

"Are you aware of your Pints of the Compass?" he inquired. "If you're not sure, put your back agin the wall, and we'll go all over 'em again, my dear, hereaway with the dogs."

Magdalen assured him that she felt quite familiar by this time with all the points, the "Nonthe" included, and then repeated her question in louder tones. The veteran obstinately matched her, by becoming deafer than ever.

"Yes, my dear," he said; "you're right; it is chilly in these passages; and when I go back to my fire my flesh'll go out—won't it?" If you don't feel warm, you'll find it do the same when come in to me and I'll put you right again." He winked benevolently, whistled to the dogs, and hobbled off with them to his model ships—to pervert his own success in balking her curiosity on the subject of the second floor. "I know how to deal with 'em!" said old Mazey to himself, in high triumph. "Tall and short, native and foreign, sweet hearts and wives—I know how to deal with 'em!"

Left by herself, Magdalen exemplified the experience of the old sailor's wonderful memories. In her particular case, by ascending the stairs immediately, to make her own observations on the second floor. The result answered to her exactly similar—except that more doors opened in more bedchambers. The fear of being discovered opened the two nearest doors, one after another, at a venture, and discovered that both rooms were bedchambers. The fear of being discovered by one of the women-servants in a part of the house with which she had no concern warned her not to push her investigations on the bedroom floor too far at starting. She hurriedly walked down the corridor passage to see if order had been observed in the matter of the doors. Yes: they were all closed. Then she descended the stairs, and returned to the lower regions.

On her way back she noticed an object which had previously escaped her attention. It was a low trucle-bed, placed parallel with the wall, and close to one of the doors on the bedroom side. In spite of its strange and comfortless situation, the bed was evidently occupied at night by a sleeper: the sheets were on it, and the end of a thick red fisherman's cap peeped out from under the pillow. She ventured on opening the door near which the bed was placed, and found herself, as she conjectured from certain signs and sounds, in the admiral's sleeping-chamber. A woman's observation of the room was all she dared risk, and softly closing the door again she returned to the kitchen regions.

The trucks-bed, and the strange position in which it was placed, dwelt on her mind all through the afternoon. Who could possibly sleep in it? The remembrance of the red fisherman's cap, and the knowledge she had already gained of Macey's dog-like fidelity to his master, helped her to guess that the old sailor might be the occupant of the truckle-bed. But why, with bedrooms enough and to spare, should he occupy that cold and comfortless situation at night? Why should he sleep on guard outside his master's door? Was there some nocturnal danger in the house of which the admiral was afraid? The question seemed absurd—and yet the position of the bed forced it irresistibly on her mind.

Situated by her own unpremeditated curiosity on this subject, Magdalen ventured to question the housekeeper. She learned nothing. Magdalen walked from end to end of the passage on the second floor, to see if it was as long as the passage on the first; and she ascertained having noticed with astonishment the position of the trucks-bed. Mrs. Drake showed not the slightest inquiry shortly and sharply. "I don't blame a young girl like you," said the old lady, "for being a little curious when she first comes into such a strange house as this. But remember, for the future, that your business does not lie in the bedroom story." Mr. Macey's room on the bed you noticed. It is his habit at night to sleep outside his master's door." With that meagre explanation Mrs. Drake's lips closed, and opened no more.

Later in the day Magdalen found an opportunity of applying to old Macey himself. She discovered the veteran in high good-humor, smoking his pipe and warming a tin mug of beer at his own snug fire.

"Mr. Macey," she asked boldly, "why do you put your bed in that cold passage?"

"What! you have been up stairs, you young jade, have you?" said old Macey, looking up from his mug with a leer.

Magdalen smiled and nodded. "Come! come! tell me," she said, coaxingly. "Why do you sleep outside the admiral's door?"

"Why do you part your hair in the middle, my dear?" asked old Macey, with another leer.

"I suppose because I am accustomed to do it," answered Magdalen.

"Ay? ay?" said the veteran. "That's why, is it? Well, my dear, the reason why I part my hair in the middle is the reason why I sleep outside the admiral's door. I knew how to deal with 'em!" chuckled old Macey, lapsing into soliloquy, and stirring up his ale in high triumph. "Tall and short, native and foreign, sweet-heart and wives—I knew how to deal with 'em!"

Magdalen's third and last attempt at solving the mystery of the truckle-bed was made while she was waiting on the admiral at dinner. The old gentleman's questions gave her an opportunity of referring to the subject without any appearance of presumption or curiosity. She proved to be quite as impenetrable, in his way, as old Macey and Mrs. Drake had been in theirs. "It doesn't concern you, my dear," said the admiral, bluntly. "Don't be curious. Look in your Old Testament when you go down stairs, and see what happened in the Garden of Eden through curiosity. Be a good girl, and don't imitate your mother Eve."

As Magdalen passed the end of the second-floor passage, late at night, proceeding alone on her way to her own room, she paused and listened. A screen was placed at the entrance of the corridor, so as to hide it from the view of persons passing up the stairs. The evening she heard on the other side of the screen encouraged her to think that it would be always a favorable time. Shading the light of her candle with her hand, she ventured close to the admiral's door, and saw to her surprise that the bed had been moved since she had seen it in the day time, so as to stand exactly across the door, and to bar the way entirely to any one who might attempt to enter the admiral's room. After this discovery, old Macey himself entering lustily, with the red fisherman's cap pulled down to his eyebrows, and the blankets drawn up to his nose, became the object of secondary importance only by comparison with his bed. That the veteran did actually sleep on guard before his master's door, and that he and the admiral and the housekeeper were in the secret of this unaccountable proceeding, was now beyond all doubt.

"A strange end"—thought Magdalen, pondering over her discovery as she stole up stairs to her own sleeping-room—"a strange end to a strange day!"

LES MISERABLES.

Extract of Letter from VICTOR HUGO to MR. WRAXALL:

"From the moment when M. Lesquiros is your friend, as he is mine, you can not fail to produce an excellent work, having for guide and director that great and noble mind. VICTOR HUGO."

John Forster, the ablest critic in England—the Literary Editor of the London Examiner—in speaking of the AUTHORIZED TRANSLATION, by WRAXALL and LESQUIROS, says:

"On the publication of this celebrated Novel, in its original form, we entered very minutely into the story. It is only now remarks for us to say that we see no consistency, no accuracy in the new version. As a rendering of the text, VERSION—refashion, as nearly as the characteristic difference between the languages admits of, all the spirit and point of the original. In the present issue, Les Misérables stands a very fair chance of having no wilde a take as the French edition."

The Authorized Edition,

Complete in One Volume, with Portraits and Biographical Sketch, is published for OWEN DOLLAR, in Paper; 60; OWEN DOLLAR and A HALF, in Muslin. NOW READY, and all orders filled from day without delay.

A. S. BARNES & BURR, 51 and 53 John St., N. Y.

EYE—Dr. M. MARGULIES, Physician to his Highness the Prince of Roumania, Author of "Ophthalmology," having had 23 years' experience in medical practice in London and Paris, has published a pamphlet for ALL DISEASES OF THE EYE, from 10 to 11 daily, and at other hours by appointment, at No. 39 2nd Ave., Cor. 1st, Astor Place, N. Y.

THE GREAT SECRET.

It is admitted by all physicians that the grand secret of health and long life lies in keeping the blood and nerves free from all taint of DISEASE and IMPURITY. When you feel continual pain in the head or bowels, or any continued uneasiness in any organ of your system of the body, you can prevent serious sickness by taking

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

Bleeding may give momentary ease, because the blood left will have more room. But by purifying it make from the blood and sustained by the blood, so waste our blood is to waste our life and ruin our constitution. But Brandreth's Pills cleanse the circulating mass so as to be fed by only taking away what it can well spare, and THEY NEVER STINT.

Mr. Draper, of Barnstable, Mass., was cured of St. Vitus Dance, General Debility, paroxysm of blood, and constipation of many years standing, by Brandreth Pills. The case at length is published in the pamphlets.

Sold at the Principal Office, No. 294 Canal Street, No. 4 Union Square, New York, and by all respectable dealers in medicine.

Rheumatism—Who has it?

It has been conclusively acknowledged by thousands who have used them that the Galvanic Rheumatic Armlets for sale are the only preventive and cure. Sold by all druggists and shoe dealers generally, or will be sent by mail for $1 25.

Send for a circular. METTAM & CO., 439 Broadway. Secured by English and American Patents.

To all Wanting Farms.

Duryeas' Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a Prize Medal. Also, Honorable Mention from the Royal Commissioners, the exception of all prominent manufacturers of the United States. "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding.

Maizena

The food and luxury of the age, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes delicious Cakes, Custards, Blanc Manges, &c., without himpkins, with few eggs, at a cost unknown before, and more economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves it and adds to its nutritive qualities. For thickening sweet meats, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c., it is unequalled. Sold by Grocers and Druggists. To be better than ever, it is now sold in packages with directions. Also, in 1 lb. tins, with directions for making a delicious cake of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Manufactured at Glen Cove, Long Island.

Wholesale Depot, 166 Fulton Street.

WM. DURYEA, General Agent.

RAILWAY TIME KEEPERS

Especially adapted for Army use. Good watches with Key, Seconds Hand, and beautifully engraved plate, the letters standing in relief. This is one of the best watches made for the price, and should retail at prices from twenty to fifty dollars each. Warranted to keep correct time for one year. They are furnished by the case, containing six of different designs, as follows:—Engine turned, in half cases, $23 00. Engraved and electro-gilded, per half dozen, assorted, $26 00. Engraved, superior, per half dozen, assorted, $30 00. Engraved, superior, and electro fine gilded, having all the improvements of the best watches, with dust doors, assorted, $36 00. Engraved, same material cases, over which good silver is deposited, per half dozen, $36 00. Any one of the foregoing, comprising two of the first, and one of each of the others, in a case, with a silver watch-chain, for $50 00. Terms—Cash. Will be sent to any part of the country by express, C.O.D. for collection on delivery. Buyers resident in the city would have to send payment in advance, as the express companies peremptorily refuse making charges on the C.O.D. plan.

This is one of the most valuable articles of the times, and will be found a ready sale by enterprising men among the soldiers.

BEGINNING OF A NEW VOLUME.
The Number for January, 1863, begins the Eleventh Volume of the Atlantic Monthly.
From the commencement, in 1857, the Atlantic has rapidly increased in circulation, and it now has the largest class of readers since its beginning, five years ago. Its prosperity steadily augments, and it continues, amid all the fluctuations and dangers incident to our national crisis, to gain ground in the estimation of the public. At a time of unusual peril to topics which touch the future destinies of America in every vital particular, the Publishers can only promise to set down at necessary to promise that its pages shall not swerve from the honest paths of loyal patriotism and unyielding devotion to principle which it has been on the side of Liberty, Progress, and Right, and the course it first adopted in the early career will ever be its fairly maintained.
THE STAFF OF WRITERS, regularly contributing to the Atlantic are Monthly, embraces many of the best known authors in American literature, and warrants the Publishers in promising to its readers,
The Best Essays,
The Best Stories,
The Best Poems,
which American talent can furnish.

List of Regular Contributors.

In Prose and Poetry, the "Atlantic" Staff of Writers is unequaled. The following authors are still among the regular contributors.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1862.

THE COST OF THE WAR.

THE Report of the Secretary of the Treasury at length places us in possession of the war bills which we have to pay. During the fiscal year ending on 30th June last, the war cost $437,042,976, or about $1,200,000 a day. During the fiscal year ending on 30th June next, it is estimated that the war will cost $829,537,333, or about 2¼ millions a day. During the fiscal year ending on 30th June, 1864, it is estimated that the war will cost $807,086,401—a trifle less than the cost during the previous year. But as the increased cost of the war during the current fiscal year includes the outfit of a million of armed men and the construction of a fleet of iron-clad vessels—expenses which it is to be hoped will not be repeated—there is reason to believe that the war bill in 1863–4—if the war lasts so long—will fall short of the Secretary's liberal estimate by a very large sum of money. Should we succeed in suppressing the rebellion by 1st July, 1863, the war will have cost the North in round figures $1,300,000,000, or about $60 per head of our total population. Should it last another year, the total cost may be increased to $100 a head. The debt of Great Britain amounts to about $154 per head of the British people: that of France to about $48 per head. We, in this country, are probably better able to pay $100 than the British $50 or the French $30.

To pay this war bill the nation has a revenue which Mr. Chase estimates at $223,000,000 for the year 1863–4; that is to say, as soon as the internal revenue Act goes fairly into operation. There are those who believe that the Secretary has underestimated the receipts from internal duties, and that they alone will amount to $225,000,000, swelling the aggregate income to $300,000,000. Assuming the official figures, however, to be accurate, they would give an annual tax of about $10\frac{50}{100}$ per head of our population—counting out the rebels and the slaves. The revenue of Great Britain ranges from $300,000,000 to $350,000,000, and will probably average $12\frac{25}{100}$ per head of the British people. The revenue of France may be set down at $350,000,000, and thus averages about $10 per head of the population. The revenue of Spain, which has a debt of less than $800,000,000, is about $60,000,000, say $4\frac{25}{100}$ of the population. It thus appears that in proportion to our debt our national revenue is larger than that of any of the other great nations, and consequently our credit and the price of our national securities should stand higher than theirs. It likewise appears that the burdens which will be laid upon our people by this war will be lighter than those which are borne by the people of England, who have no virgin soil and unoccupied land, and whose material prosperity has always been much less than ours.

On 1st December, 1862, the total debt of the United States—exclusive of bills unaudited and troops unpaid—amounted to $636,343,000, of which $222,932,000 consisted of legal tender notes, $79,789,000 of deposits on call, and $87,363,000 of certificates of indebtedness maturing in one year from date. The total amount of funded debt was only $143,750,000. It was Mr. Chase's hope, when he began to issue legal tender notes, that they would soon be funded into his 5.20 bonds. But the very convertibility of these bonds has checked their free circulation, and prevented their being funded. People have hoarded them, knowing that they could fund them at any time; and they have become scarce, just like the convertible treasury notes which were issued in the year 1814. It is evident that whatever amount of these convertible issues be floated people will not be in any hurry to fund them, and though the evils incident to such a policy—in the advance of prices and the disturbance of values—are inevitable, its benefits may never be realized.

The net deficit for the current year 1862–3 is set down in the Treasury Report at $200,000,000: the precise sum is $276,000,000, less $50,000,000 to be derived from bank issues, and $25,000,000 from temporary deposits. To raise this sum two plans are suggested. One, which emanates from Mr Chase, proposes the sale in open market of 7.30 notes, convertible into long bonds. The other, which is proposed by Mr. Stevens, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, contemplates the issue of $200,000,000 more treasury notes, coupled with the compulsory withdrawal from circulation of all bank-notes in excess of one half of the capital of the bank which issues them. When this issue of $200,000,000 is exhausted Mr. Stevens proposes to authorize Mr. Chase to sell long bonds bearing twenty years' interest, in the open market, at whatever he can get for them. It is not very likely that the project for "driving in" the redundant circulation of the banks will meet with much favor in Congress. Of all interests the bank interest is the most powerful, and it is pretty sure to command a party in Congress strong enough to defeat a measure which is aimed at its very existence. On the other hand, the speculative interest, which is likewise influential, and which has its adherents in Congress, is bent on obtaining further issues of paper at any cost to the nation at large. Between the two, the people at large, who are already suffering from the high prices caused by the issues of irredeemable paper, and whose interest is in favor of a return to legitimate financial methods, may not obtain a fair hearing. Mr. Chase may succeed in carrying his point against the speculators. But he will evidently have a close fight of it.

THE WAR IN THE SOUTHWEST.

WE have reason to believe that the highest military authorities at Washington are of opinion that within ninety days the valley of the Mississippi and the bulk of the cotton-growing regions of the South will be under the control of the forces of the United States. We know that General Hovey is at Grenada, and Generals Grant and Sherman not far behind him; that General M'Clernand with a very powerful military column, supported by a fleet of iron-clad gun-boats, is slowly descending the Mississippi to operate against Vicksburg, while the remainder of the loyal army of the Southwest is moving upon Jackson; and there is now no further use in concealing the probability that General Banks has gone to Mobile, where Farragut's fleet already awaits his arrival. These combined armies will constitute a force of fully 175,000 men, considerably more than can be opposed to them, and amply sufficient, in the opinion of competent military judges, to take and to hold the entire Mississippi Valley, including Mobile, Jackson, Little Rock, and both shores of the river from New Orleans to Cairo.

General Beauregard, in an intercepted dispatch which has been published in the papers, declared that the loss of the Mississippi Valley would be the ruin of the Confederacy. And he was right. The recovery of that tract of country, in the first place, bisects the Confederacy and cripples it as the ligature of the main artery would cripple an individual. It isolates Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas from the Atlantic States, deprives the former of arms and munitions of war, and the latter of beef and supplies. It gives us possession of cotton enough to revolutionize the manufacturing trade throughout the world, and stop the mouths of foreign enemies of the blockade. And, more important than all, it enables the Northwest to pour down the great river abundant supplies of food to the starving denizens of the lower Mississippi Valley, who are now kept in a state of unparalleled misery by the military despotism of Jeff Davis's lieutenants.

If our Generals succeed, by 1st March next, in reconquering the Mississippi Valley and holding it, the insurrection will then be confined to parts of Virginia and North Carolina, the uplands of South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, and the mountain districts of Tennessee. If Burnside and Rosecrans fulfill the expectations which people entertain respecting them, the rebels may not hold as much territory as this. But even if nothing substantial be achieved by the armies of the Potomac and the Ohio, the rebellion will still have shrunk, on 1st March, into such narrow proportions that it will baffle the ingenuity of even such pro-slavery partisans as Mr. Gladstone and Lord John Russell to find an excuse for its recognition.

What may be the condition of the slaves in the South on 1st March next no one can yet tell. Events are progressing very rapidly, and facts, incredible a year ago, are now undoubted. General Butler has a reliable brigade of black troops. General Brannan has several regiments of escaped slaves, who have fought valiantly in South Carolina. General Sherman—who commenced his career by offering to maintain slavery in South Carolina—now notifies his officers at Memphis that they must receive all fugitive slaves, feed, and set them to work on wages. General Butler compels the planters in the Lafourche district in Louisiana to pay their slaves regular wages. On New-Year's Day every slave in Secessia becomes entitled to claim that the United States protect him or her in the enjoyment of freedom. Whatever happens, it is pretty clear that the sun of the 1st March next will shine on a very different condition of society in the rebel States from that which existed on 1st March, 1862.

THE LOUNGER.

"WAYWARD" TALKING.

OUR wayward sisters, the rebels at the South, and their bottle-holders at the North, keep up a lively game. Here, for instance, is the wayward sister whose trump card is, "Let 'em go;" he has been kindly patting the Government upon the back, and saying, "There, you poor, miserable thing, you shall try to totter on a little longer, so you shall!" Sister Van Buren says: "So long as the Government goes on in strict conformity to the Constitution and the laws they will be allowed to linger out a sickly existence until the close of their official term; but the moment they overstep the Constitution, the moment they depart from well-ascertained principles of right, they resolve society into its original elements. They give notice to us, who have the physical force, not only that physical force resides with the governed, but that resistance to tyrants is obedience to God!" Loud cheers from Captain Rynders and Company.

This is "Conservative" speech-making, as at present practiced in the city of New York. This is the expression of a "sound public sentiment" and "returning reason." The Democratic party, it appears, as represented by Vallandigham, and not by Dickinson, Holt, Andy Johnson, and others somewhat known to fame, is the natural ruler of the country. But it has no national force whatever except as a bob to the tail of Slavery. Consequently, the Slave Interest is the natural supreme power of the land. By some absurd mistake it fell out of its place two years ago, but will not take it again by force unless the present holders of power violate the Constitution. That interest will determine what the Constitution is, and what is a violation of it: and when it happens to think that it is violated it will turn things upside down, and reorgenize them by physical force.

Conservatism of the wayward sister school as thus expounded is in its own terms this: The Democratic party, when Fernando Wood tells it that the Constitution is violated, is justified in rising against the Government.

Sister V. B. is so extremely wayward as to be generally thought a jester; but his words mean exactly that, if they mean any thing at all. Now he and all the rest of his school ought to understand that as that kind of "physical force," bluster and general plantation rhetoric, utterly broke down in Congress, and did not captivate the country, even when reinforced by the "physical force" of Brooks's bludgeon, so it breaks down contemptibly in the face of a civil war produced by its spirit. The "physical force" of the New York mob may be at the beck of Sister Wood or Sister Van Buren, or any other of the wayward family; but that of the country at large obeys the command of its Government.

The very core and pith of the war is the settlement of the question whether the Slave masters, with their obedient sisters at the North, are the natural supreme power of the country. We are fighting to determine whether our Government shall be administered to protect Slavery or to defend Liberty; whether Slavery may upset the Government by "physical force" to suit its own purpose, or whether it shall take its constitutional chances. All the vapors of all the wayward sisters in the land will not for a single moment confuse the national perception of this point.

Meanwhile let Sister V. B. continue in his own wayward manner to shake his valiant fist at the Government, and call upon the "physical force" to spurn and resist the blind and reckless despotism of the bloated old tyrant who dares to defile the house consecrated by the exalted memories of Buchanan. It is a pity, but the "physical force" does not hear. It is engaged in finishing another despot whose destruction will release a clever but wayward sister like Mr. Van Buren from the political necessity of talking such melancholy stuff as his recent speeches.

POLITICAL PREACHING.

WILL the Lounger, asks a friend, give us a short sermon upon Political Preaching? It seems that a worthy clergyman was urged to make some recognition of the fact that the country was rent with a fearful war for the most atrocious of objects, and he declined upon the ground that he would have no political preaching in his pulpit. There are a good many shallow-pates who, without the clergyman's real worth, will think that he made an exceedingly clever reply. Why, they ask, can't we have religion preached in church? The basest newspapers and the most dishonest politicians in the land clamor incessantly to have, as the eminent conservative Vallandigham says, Christ and not the nigger preached. The zeal of people who hold that Christianity is a vast religious justification of injustice, to have pure Christianity preached, is most edifying. The interest that Rynders and other conservative saints take in a pure gospel is touching and amazing. Let us see then what political preaching is.

A sermon is the application of the divine law to the condition and wants of a particular parish. The law is general; the object of preaching is to make it special. For instance, the law is to love our neighbor as ourselves. The preacher takes that text to apply to us, his congregation. How can he do it but by showing us who our neighbor is, what it is to love him, and how we can prove our love? To reiterate the text indefinitely is not to preach. To say that of course we ought to love our brethren, and that if we don't love them we are very naughty, and the bad place will get us in the end, is not preaching. But to say that as God made all men of one blood, and as Christ loved all equally, therefore every man of every country and race and condition is our brother, and is to be treated as we would be treated, that is evidently preaching. Or to repeat the law of love, and then to insist that love requires us to seize the weaker brother and shut him up and lash him freely and wear him out in seven years by making sugar, that also is preaching, for that is a practical application of the divine law.

But what is there political in all this? Because, in the first case, we have supposed a preacher advocates equal justice as the proof of neighborly love, and it happens that a political party is trying to do injustice by law, is it a political sermon? If a minister urged that the tariff on foreign books ought to be nine instead of ten per cent. upon their value, there would be some sense in complaining that he preached politics. But if he says that lying is a sin, and that we as a nation, and his hearers as part of it, have lied to the Indians and ought to be ashamed of themselves, and, if they don't repent and mend their ways, will be punished, he is doing exactly what he was ordained to do.

The friend who requested this sermon probably knows that the talk about political preaching proceeds from people whose party discipline requires the support of slavery, and who therefore insist that because politics have touched the subject it has ceased to be a moral question. Do they object to hear preaching against swearing, or lying, or thieving, or profaning the Sabbath day by reading novels? Oh no; that is legitimate preaching. But if old Rum Puncheon hears a clergyman denounce drunkenness and the makers of drunkards he rises, and thumps down the aisle, and bangs out at the door, and wishes that the parson wouldn't preach those d—d political sermons.

It is remarked that horses always spring if you touch them on the raw.

GENERAL BUTLER.

AMONG the men who have deserved well of the country during the last two years no one is more eminent than General Butler. One of the first citizens to march at the call of the Government, he was not rebuffed by delays, but carried his regiment to the nearest practicable point to Washington. While other generals and conflicting councils higgled and delayed about investing Baltimore, or reducing Baltimore, or parleying with Baltimore, General Butler quietly moved with two regiments and took Baltimore, so that we have held it fast ever since. Sent to Fort Monroe, he was, as chief in command, popularly held responsible for the disaster of Great Bethel; but that he was truly accountable for it has not yet clearly appeared. Later, in company with Stringham, he was heard of at Hatteras.

There followed a few months in which, under a kind of roving commission, he was engaged in collecting a great force. There were long and loud debates. The Governor of Massachusetts and the General differed. There were infinite delays. But at last his expedition sailed. It did not take with it unquestioning public confidence. The public was anxious to hear rather than sanguine. But when it did hear it heard the most striking and splendid news of the war—the capture of New Orleans by Farragut and Porter, and its occupation in concert by Butler.

From that moment he has held New Orleans like a nut in his hand. He has played no foolish and wicked game of olive branches and swords. He knew that he had his foot in the den of the most malignant enemies. There might be friends also; but his duty was by saving himself to save them. And he has ruled the city with a rod of iron. Any staff less stern would have snapped in his hand, and struck back fatally upon the country. He has been hated and abused by the enemy with a ferocity that showed how firm and faithful his hold upon them was. England and Europe have shrieked at his "inhumanity"—as old women squall when a policeman seizes a thief. He found an ordinance of the city which sent to the calaboose all loose women actively soliciting upon the street, and he put it in force against all women who could not contain their angry passions sufficiently to forbear from insulting and reviling loyal soldiers. Every other measure of his administration has shown the same comprehension, sagacity, and resolution. Neither consuls, nor foreigners, nor bankers, nor rich semi-traitors who wished to be "neutral," have for a moment confused his perception or delayed his action. His hand and his head have worked together promptly, vigorously, incisively. If every General who is equally loyal had been equally perceptive, rapid, and resolute, there would have been fewer dismal passages in our history. Had his system and spirit in managing New Orleans been those of the nation in dealing with the rebellion, its military importance would already have disappeared.

Theodore Winthrop was General Butler's aid and Military Secretary at Fort Monroe at the time he fell. Just before leaving upon the sad expedition to Great Bethel, he had been writing a paper upon the life there. In that he says: "When I arrived Fort Monroe and the neighborhood were occupied by two armies. 1st, General Butler's; 2d, About six thousand men here and at Newport News—making together more than twelve thousand men. Of the first army, consisting of the General, I will not speak. Let his past supreme services speak for him, as I doubt not the Future will."

The Future has spoken.

POPULAR AMUSEMENT.

How long the system of courses of miscellaneous Lyceum lectures would continue without change has always been a speculation among those who are interested in it. The number of additions to the corps of lecturers in the country is so slight, being usually made up of the last successful author, who is taken upon trial to determine if he sounds as well as he reads, that it was evident how strong was the tap-root of the system which fed upon much the same nourishment from year to year.

There are lately symptoms of some modification. The tendency is to combine the charm of dramatic with literary attraction, which is not essentially a new thing, but is newly developed here. Charles Matthews and Albert Smith were the extreme representatives of this style in London; and Edmond Yates and Harold Power, the latter the son of Tyrone Power, and the former, we believe, of the Edmund Yates who incensed Thackeray, are following Albert Smith with sketches of life in Australia. Mr. Glaisher, also, the aeronaut, is telling his story of balloon ascents "in a popular form." To the same general range, although of course, very different in itself, belongs Dickens's reading of his own works. This author takes his little book after dinner; puts it in his pocket; puts on his hat; walks a little way to the hall; emerges upon the platform before a most crowded and brilliant audience; reads to their rapturous delight for a couple of hours; rises and makes his bow; as he passes out is handed a little sum of seven or eight hundred, or a thousand dollars; walks home, takes off his hat; puts on his slippers, and sits before his fire, his duty for that day and that evening happily accomplished.

In this country the earnestness of our feeling about the war does not affect this kind of entertainment. The lecture must be more than a lecture. The most popular of all our lecturers is Mr. Gough, whose discourses are dramatic monologues, but with the advantage of a special moral, which always pleases the American mind. The dramatic readings of Mr. Vandenhoff and of several ladies are received in lecture courses with the utmost favor; while Mr. De Cordova has established a series of winter evening entertainments which are really humorous lectures: "Mrs. Smith's Surprise Party," or "A Summer's Day at Long Branch," and with such success that his increasing audience has driven him from Clinton Hall to Niblo's Saloon.

In all these successes, however, two exceptional gifts are essential, dramatic power and popular humor. It seems easy enough for an author to read his own books aloud; but not to say that Mrs. Browning declares that true poets never read "their own verses to their worth," it is very clear that it is not the mere fact of Dickens the author reading Dickens the work which continues to attract and delight, but Dickens with incomparable dramatic power, giving body and color and wonderfully enhanced raciness to the printed outlines of his imaginative and humorous creations. Thackeray's stories read by Thackeray, unless from the manuscript, would be hardly better than our own private reading. Bulwer's would probably be a great deal worse: for to hear an ancient coxcomb sighing out slipslop sentimentality could not be very edifying.

Therefore all the writers of stories must not at once suppose that by putting on their hats and crossing the street with the little book under their arms they would necessarily find either the brilliant crowd in the hall or the pile of dollars at the door. It would be a good rule to remember, that when they can write like Dickens they can read like him. But every man who has the necessary gifts of dramatic humor and literary skill may be very sure that success awaits the proper application of his powers. The Lyceum is only another of the many avenues which are opened to ability of every kind. Like the Church, it is Catholic. It embraces cardinals in gold and beggars in rags. It welcomes actors and orators and readers, and why not singers? Why should not the Lyceum in every minor town (if there are any such in the country) make itself the alma mater of every thing that is excellent in this way?

A DEMOCRATIC COLONEL SPEAKING TO THE QUESTION.

THE Union Meeting in New Orleans is one of the most interesting events of the last few weeks, because, although it may be said that it is not difficult for a General to hold a meeting of any kind under the guns of his army, yet the remarks of the speakers have a peculiar significance coming from men who stand in a hostile region and with their lives in their hands. The orators in New Orleans were not in the least mealy-mouthed. They did not complain of the suppression of free speech because a man is not permitted to say that the war was caused by those upon whom war was made, and that the makers were in the right. They did not demand that every privilege shall be allowed in war which is a matter of course in peace. They did not say that they were willing to see the country ruined, and the government destroyed, and the hope of equal and progressive civil liberty smothered if the wayward sisters wanted it. On the contrary, the speakers were also soldiers who were there for the express purpose of preventing the wayward sisters from doing what they chose, and compelling them to submit to law.

What they did not say is the staple of all speeches at secession meetings in the North. But the secession orators at the North are not soldiers, except on condition that they may go as major-generals and leave when they wish—they are merely politicians struggling to revive a party by embarrassing the Government and helping rebellion. And as slavery is the strength of the insurrection, they are forever bawling that black men are inferior to white men—that the war is a conspiracy to bring black men to the North to take the bread out of white men's mouths; and they echo it, and re-echo it, for the purpose of securing slavery intact. "Would you like to marry your daughter to a negro?" demand these noble fellows. "Probably not," is doubtless the reply of the perceptive audience—"nor to you; nor to any mean, drunken, ignorant, degraded man of any nation or of any color. There is a choice in husbands."

But while this is the lofty and patriotic discourse of disunion orators here, the strain of Union orators in Dixie, who belonged lately to the same party organization, is significantly different. Colonel Deming, for instance, was late Democratic Mayor of Hartford in Connecticut. He is now the chief of a volunteer regiment from that State. He is noted as an orator, and he spoke at the New Orleans Union Meeting. Let us in the intervals of hearing the question whether we think black people as good as we are, and whether we are anxious for black sons-in-law, listen to what the Colonel is saying, in that brilliant house, to that enthusiastic crowd, and in the presence of General Butler, "Breckinridge democrat" of two years ago.

"The rebellion has not secured an augmented domain or everlasting prosperity to the institution of Slavery. On the contrary, as the only security for the existence of such a monstrous anomaly to the civilization of the age was in the compromises of the Constitution, so the only way in which the monster could be seriously imperiled was by their overthrow. There is scarcely a prominent man in the New England division here but has spent the vigor of his manhood and sacrificed all his hopes of political advancement by vindicating the constitutional rights of the South upon this very Slavery question; but when you withdrew the thing we hated morally but defended politically, from beneath the wings of Constitutional compromise, and immediately placed it outside the Constitution, it absolved me and every other Northern Democrat from being any longer its apologist or defender."

Here are manliness, frankness, and common sense. And while the Administration may count upon such Democrats as Deming, Andy Johnson, Butler, and Holt, it will hardly be troubled by such as Vallandigham, Schnabel, and Saulsbury.

RETALIATION.

IN a letter to a hesitating friend last week we spoke of the execution of the ten rebels by M'Neil as if it were a justifiable severity. But the illustration was not well chosen, for the whole affair was between banditti. There are two bands, apparently like the Skinners and Cowboys in the Revolution, who are really lawless marauders in Missouri, and M'Neil is not a military officer of the United States. The rebel Porter, who is the head of the opposing band, but whether with a formal commission from the rebel chiefs at Richmond does not appear. Porter was believed to have caused the disappearance of Allsman, a Union man. Some of his banditti, who were concerned in the affair, fell into M'Neil's hands. He demanded Allsman of Porter, under the threat that if he were not presently given up ten of Porter's band should be shot. The man was not surrendered, and M'Neil kept his word.

For this proceeding Davis orders that the first ten officers who fall into the hands of the rebel commander in that region shall be put to death. It is a retaliation upon the Government for an unauthorized act of an irresponsible partisan leader. Should it be effected it will not make an easier reckoning for the rebels. That it will be effected, we have no right to doubt; for the rebels are certainly in earnest, and are not afraid of making war inhumanly.

A remarkable case of conscience was lately developed in a proceeding before a French court. A man was before the court on a charge of stealing some candles, and the prosecutor was examining witnesses who had bought from him. One of them said, "Though he suspected the candles had been stolen, he bought a sou's worth, but that, in order not to encourage robbery, he had paid for them with a bad sou."

Nearly every evil has its compensation. If a man has but one foot he never treads on his own toes.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Wednesday, December 3, in the Senate, the standing committee were appointed. An inquiry was ordered into the expediency of indemnifying citizens of Minnesota for losses by the Indian outbreak. On motion of Senator Sumner, a call was made on the Secretary of War for information relative to the seizure and sale of free blacks by the rebels, and what steps have been taken in the matter. Senator Hale gave notice of a bill repealing the act passed in July last, establishing and equalizing the grades of naval officers. The Senate then went into executive session, and afterward adjourned.——In the House, a motion was adopted directing a pretty thorough overhauling of the accounts of the Agricultural Department.

On Thursday, th, in the Senate, Senator Clark offered a joint resolution, which was laid over, approving of the policy of the President's emancipation proclamation. A bill repealing the act establishing and equalizing the grade of naval officers was introduced and appropriately referred.——In the House, Mr. Stevens offered resolutions declaring that the Union must be and remain one and indivisible forever, and denouncing as guilty of high crime any executive or legislative department that shall propose or advise any acceptance of peace on any other basis than the integrity and entire unity of the United States as they existed at the time the rebellion commenced. The 16th was, on motion of Mr. Stevens, assigned for the consideration of this subject. Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, offered a resolution directing inquiry respecting the Military Governor of the District of Columbia—under what law he derives his power, his compensation, the expenses of his office, and whether he has obstructed the civil tribunals in the administration of justice. A motion to lay the subject on the table was adopted by a vote of eighty-five against forty-six. A resolution abolishing the West Point Military Academy and aiding in the establishment of military schools in the States was rejected by a decisive vote.

On Friday, 5th, in the Senate, the House bill requiring payments in gold and silver for all judgments recovered by the United States was referred to the Finance Committee. The resolution calling for all documents relating to the operations of the Army of the Potomac and the surrender of Harper's Ferry was adopted. Senator Powell's resolution respecting the illegal arrest of citizens of Kentucky was adopted. A bill repealing the provision of law limiting the number of major-generals was reported and referred, as was also a bill concerning appointments in the navy. A resolution calling on the President for all the information in his possession touching the Indian outbreak in Minnesota was agreed to. An executive session was held, and afterward the Senate adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Stevens introduced a bill indemnifying and protecting the President and other public officers from arrest, imprisonment, and other consequences growing out of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Owing to a slight informality Mr. Stevens withdrew the bill for the present. Mr. Morrill offered a resolution declaring "that at no time since the existence of the rebellion have the forces and material in the hands of the Executive of the Government been so ample to and abundant for the speedy termination of the war as at the present moment; and that it is the duty of all loyal American citizens, regardless of minor differences of opinion, and especially is it the duty of every officer and soldier, and of those in every branch of the Government, including the legislative, cordially to strike the assassins at once who have conspired to destroy our existence, prosperity, and freedom, of which we are justly proud at home and abroad, and which we stand pledged to perpetuate forever." This was adopted, but one member voting in the negative. An inquiry into the causes of the Indian outbreak in the Northwest was ordered, and a call was made for all correspondence on the present condition of Mexican affairs. Mr. Allen, of Illinois, asked, but failed to obtain leave, to offer a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the alleged right of the Federal Government to set at defiance the Constitution, laws, and sentiments of the people of Illinois, in importing negroes into that State, and to consider what action is necessary to bring about the deportation of said negroes. Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, 8th, in the Senate, the Bankrupt bill was taken up and made the special order for Thursday, the 18th inst. The House bill requiring payment in gold and silver for satisfaction of judgments in certain suits brought by the United States was passed. A bill providing for the development of the mineral resources of the public domain was introduced by Senator Latham, and referred. Resolutions calling on the Secretary of War for the number of Major and Brigadier Generals in the service, and where and how they are employed, also the number and rank of aids-de-camp, were adopted. Senator Saulsbury called up the resolution relating to arrests in Delaware, but objection was made to its consideration, and after some conversation the subject was dropped. Senator Davis introduced a joint resolution proposing amendments to the Constitution in reference to the mode of electing the President and Vice-President.——In the House, the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means introduced a new financial plan for the Government. It provides for the redemption and cancelation of the 5.20 and 7.30 bonds, the redemption of the temporary deposits, and an issue of $1,000,000,000 bonds and $500,000,000 legal tender notes. It also assesses a heavy tax on bank circulation. The Bankrupt bill was made the special order for the 18th inst. The Standing Committees were announced. Mr. Stevens introduced a bill to indemnify the President and other persons for suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus and for all acts done in pursuance thereof, and after some manœuvring the previous question was ordered, and the bill passed by a vote of 90 against 45. Mr. Van Wyck introduced a bill to provide for the immediate payment of clothing lost in service by soldiers of the United States army; also a bill increasing the pay of privates, non-commissioned officers, and musicians. Both bills were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. Wickliffe introduced a bill for the protection and relief of persons in loyal States whose property has been seized or stolen by United States officers. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee. On motion of Mr. M'Knight the Committee of Ways and Means was instructed to inquire into the expediency of modifying the Tax law so as to dispense with the tax on advertisements.

On Tuesday, 9th, in the Senate, a communication was received from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution calling for information in relation to the alleged sale of free negroes captured by the rebels, in which he states that the War Department has no information in regard to the subject in its possession. The resolutions calling for information relative to the arbitrary arrest of citizens of Delaware were taken up and discussed at considerable length; but the Senate adjourned without taking final action on the subject.——In the House, the morning hour was devoted to the consideration of the Senate bill for the admission of Western Virginia into the Union as a State. The special order, a bill authorizing collectors and assessors of taxes to administer oaths, was taken up and passed. The debate on the question of the admission of Western Virginia into the Union was then resumed, and continued until the adjournment.

WINCHESTER REOCCUPIED.

General Geary marched upon Winchester on the 3d inst. and demanded its surrender, which was complied with, the people exhibiting many signs of joy at his arrival. His command consisted of 3300 chosen infantry from all the regiments in his division, two sections of artillery from Knapp's battery, two from M'Gilery's battery, and two from Hampton's battery, making altogether twelve guns, and fifty cavalry of the First Maryland.

GENERAL GRANT AT ABBEVILLE.

General Grant telegraphs from Abbeville, Mississippi, to General Halleck that his troops are in possession of that place. The rebels abandoned their fortifications there on the 2d inst., destroying all the stores they could not carry. The streams were so high that only a portion of our cavalry could cross by swimming; but the enemy was pursued to Oxford, where, after a skirmish of two hours, sixty of their number were captured. General Grant says that the roads are too bad to get supplies for a long chase.

THE PURSUIT.

Dispatches from Cairo state that the main body of the rebel army passed through Oxford, Mississippi, forty thousand strong, going South, on 3d, under command of General Jackson (of the West). His rear-guard had a skirmish next morning with a portion of the Union forces near Oxford, the result of which is not stated. Another dispatch from Chicago says that intelligence was received from Oxford, dated the 7th, to the effect that a two hours' fight had taken place on 5th, near Coffeeville, between the Union cavalry under Colonel Dickey, and a rebel force of five thousand infantry, cavalry, and artillery. Our troops lost five killed, fifty wounded, and sixty missing. The rebels, it is said, lost three hundred killed and wounded.

GENERAL HOVEY AT HELENA.

General Hovey's expedition, twenty thousand strong, which left Helena, Arkansas, some days ago, landed at Friar's Point, fifteen or twenty miles below, marched to Grenada, Mississippi, and took possession of that place on 1st. A large number of the citizens fled on the approach of our troops. The proprietor of the Appeal had to make another skedaddle. He has now fled to Marietta, Georgia, with his paper.

DISASTER IN TENNESSEE.

At Hartsville, Tennessee, on December 6, the rebel guerrilla Morgan made an attack upon the brigade commanded by General Moore at that place, which consisted of the 104th Illinois, Colonel Moore commanding brigade; 106th Ohio, Colonel Lafel; 108th Ohio, Colonel Limberg; Nicklen's battery, and a small detachment of the 2d Indiana cavalry. After fighting an hour and a quarter our forces surrendered, and the enemy burned our camp, capturing nearly all the brigade, train, and teams, and burning what they could not carry away. Two guns of Nicklen's battery were also captured. Our loss was between 50 and 60 killed and wounded, who were left on the field. The rebel loss is not reported. Morgan's force consisted of three regiments of cavalry and two of infantry. It was said that Morgan made another attack upon General Fry's position at Gallatin the same afternoon, but met with a serious repulse. General Fry was speedily reinforced, and pursued the enemy. It would appear that in the attack at Hartsville some of our troops behaved badly, while others fought gallantly to the last.

DESPERATE BATTLE IN ARKANSAS.

A desperate fight and a brilliant victory for the Union forces occurred in Arkansas on 7th. While General Herron, with a force of about seven thousand men was hastening to reinforce General Blunt, at Cane Hill, the enemy, twenty-four thousand strong, in four divisions, under Generals Parsons, Marmaduke, Frost, and Rains, all commanded by General Hindman, having flanked General Blunt's position, made a desperate attack on General Herron, at Crawford's Prairie, to prevent his junction with Blunt. Herron fought them gallantly with his Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Indiana troops, from ten o'clock in the morning until dark, keeping them at bay and driving them from two strong positions with his artillery during the day. The 20th Wisconsin captured a rebel battery; but were forced, by the fire of the enemy, to abandon it. The 19th Iowa took the same battery, but were also obliged to surrender it. Affairs were going hard with our troops. At four o'clock in the afternoon, however, General Blunt arrived in the enemy's rear, with five thousand men, and fell upon them. The fight then became one of desperation. Though superior in numbers, and maintaining their ground throughout the day, the rebels, now between two hostile forces, made fierce efforts to capture the batteries which General Blunt brought to bear upon them, but without success. They could not extricate themselves from the difficulty, and were repulsed with great slaughter. At nine o'clock, when darkness fell upon the scene of battle, they were flying over the Boston mountains in confusion, and our victorious army held the whole field. Our loss was six hundred killed and wounded. The rebels admit the loss of fifteen hundred, including several field officers.

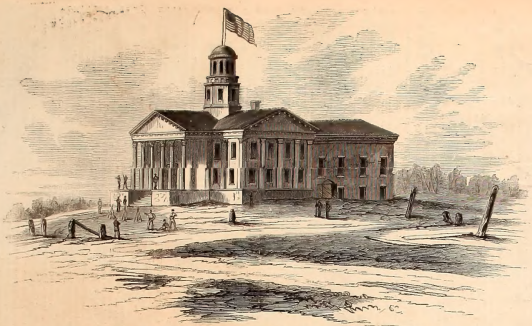
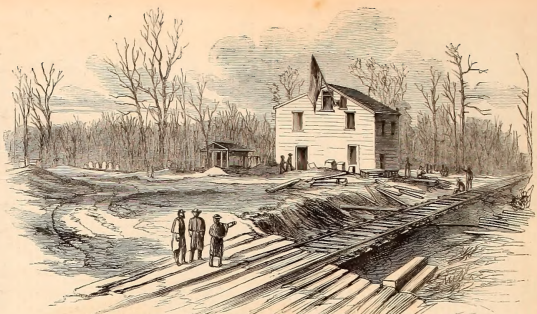
Mr. Chase recommends that the deficiency for the current year be raised by loans, and that no more legal tender notes be issued.

A COTTON CURRENCY.



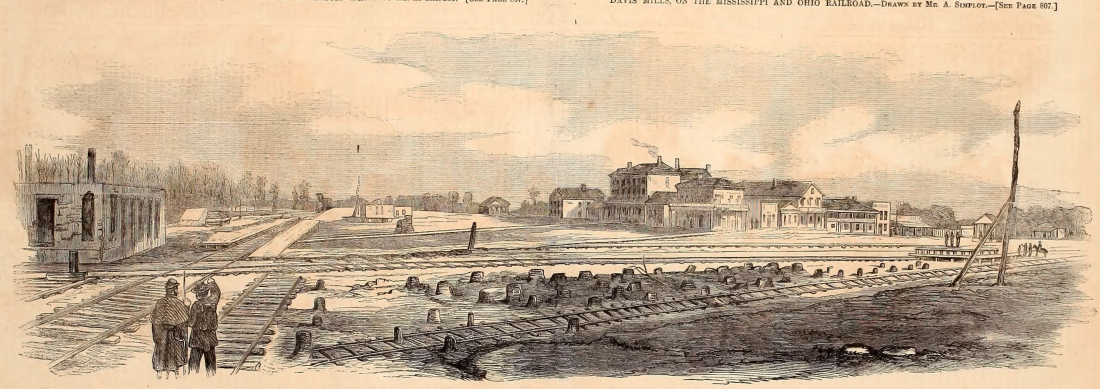
General W. T. Sherman, who is the military commander at Memphis, recommends that, instead of shinplasters—which the Common Council of that city proposes to issue —five, ten, twenty-five, and fifty cent packages of raw cotton be done up and passed as currency—the cotton to be of the standard value of half a dollar a pound.

NORFOLK TO ELECT A MEMBER OF CONGRESS.



From Fortress Monroe we learn that General Viele has issued a proclamation as Military Governor of Norfolk and a writ of election for another member of Congress from Southeastern Virginia, comprising in the district the city of Norfolk, together with the counties of Princess Anne, Nansemond, Isle of Wight, and the city of Portsmouth. It is supposed that the people will eagerly accede to the proclamation, and elect a member, for the sake of preserving their slave property from the effects of the emancipation proclamation of the President, as the Hon. Mr. Segar, who was previously elected for another district, is believed to have secured his constituents from the operations of that proclamation.

ARREST OF A UNITED STATES MARSHAL.



The Grand Jury of Hunterdon county, New Jersey, have indicted a Deputy United States Marshal and other parties, for the arrest, without process of law, of Messrs. Wright & Kugler on a charge of interfering with enlistments. The Marshal has accordingly been arrested. It is said that the United States District Attorney authorized the arrests of these gentlemen.

DECEMBER.

The snow, thick fallen in the silent night,
Hath taken every branch, and every leaf
Enrage with its dazzling weight. The fragile birch,
Its throaty branches thickened with its load,
Strangely contrasts with yonder cedars,
That bends beneath the agglomerated mass
Resting upon its leaves. The towering pines,
Its withered tassels hanging in the sky,
Surmounts the wondrous scene. Each shrub and tree
Stands out in strangest individuality
Beneath its snowy pall. While blackly limps
Beneath the snowy pall, while blackly limps
Mark the bared evergreens, slim throaty lines!
The bloom and color. Seasonably grotesque
Looks the giant cedar, a huge starry figure
Glittering on every horizontal bough.
Like a colossal Indian, cut in stone
By some bold master-hand. The glistening hem
Is scarcely marked by footprint of a bird.
The hidden garden path hath not a stain;
Each flower hath its covered of snow
And not a thing so vulgar or so mean
But does as emblem take. Tree, shrub, and flower
Stand in white livery out upon the eye,
Like some bright dream. The small and feather chime
A sameness of tone seems to fill; the scene
Seems subdued and collapsed, and nearer drawn
The cozy fire-side circle, than in days
As with a spell, a strangely silent world.

CHAPTER II.

The first week passed, the second week passed, and Magdalen was, to all appearance, no nearer to the discovery of the Secret Trust than on the day on which she first entered as her servant at St. Crux.

But the forlorn, uneventful thought it was, had not been a forthright lost. Experience had already satisfied her on one important point—experience had shown that she could not be trusted distrust of the other servants safely at defiance. Time had ascertained the women of the household in the house, without shaking the vague conviction, which possessed them all alike, that the mistress was not one of them. Gradually All that Magdalen could do in her own defense was to keep the instinctive female suspicion of her confined to those proper and common limits which it had occupied from the first, and this she scrupulously did. Day after day she closely watched her with the untiring vigilance of malice and distrust, and day after day not the vestige of a discovery rewarded them for their pains. Silently, intelligently, and industriously, with an unconscious appearance of being under no other place, the new parlor-maid did her work. Her only intervals of rest and relaxation were the intervals passed occasionally, in the early day, with old Mazey and the dogs, and the precious interval of the night, during which she was secure from observation in the solitude of her room. Gratitude to the superfluity of bedchambers at St. Crux, each one of the servants had the choice, if she pleased, of sleeping in a room of her own. Alone in the night, Magdalen might dare to be herself again—might throw off the part, and wake from the dream, encountering no curious eyes to notice that she was in tears—might ponder over the future, and be roused by no whispering in corners, which tainted her with the suspicion of having something on her mind.

Satisfied, thus far, of the perfect security of her position in the house, she spent next by a second scheme in her favor, which—before the fortnight was at an end—relieved her mind of all doubt on the formidable subject of Mrs. Lecount.

Early after the accidental gossip by the women at the table in the servants' hall—gathered from a marked paragraph in a Swiss newspaper which she had found one morning lying idle on the admiral's easy-chair—she gained the welcome assurance that no danger was to be dreaded this time from the housekeeper's knowledge of the scene. Mrs. Lecount had, as it appeared, passed a week at the Hague, on the first visit to her master's death, and had then left England to live on the interest of her legacy, in honorable and prosperous retirement in her native place. The paragraph in the Swiss newspaper described the fulfillment of this laudable project. Mrs. Lecount had not only established herself at Zurich, but (wisely mindful of the uncertainty of life) had also settled the disposal of her estates to which her fortune was to be applied after her death. One half of it was to go to the founding of a "Lecount Scholarship" for the students in the University of Geneva. The other half was to be employed by the municipal authorities of Zurich in the maintenance and education of a certain number of orphan girls, natives of the city, who were to be taught the domestic service in later life. The Swiss journalist adverted to these philanthropic bequests in terms of extravagant eulogy, and concluded by congratulating on the possession of a Paragon of public virtues a man, William Dell, on the ancient of benefactor to Switzerland, was compared disadvantageously with Mrs. Lecount.

The third week began, and Magdalen was now at liberty to take her first step forward on the way to the discovery of the Secret Trust.

She ascertained from old Mazey that it was his master's custom, during the winter and spring months, to occupy the rooms in the west wing; and during the summer and autumn to cross the Arctic passage of "Freeze-your-Bones," and live in the eastward apartments which looked out on the garden. While the Banqueting Hall remained—owing to the admiral's tasteless penurious resources—in its damp and dismantled state, and while the interior of St. Crux was thus comfortably divided into two separate residences, no more convenient arrangement than this could well have been devised. Key and Bolt (as Magdalen understood from her informant) there were days both in winter and summer when the admiral became anxious about the condition of the rooms which he was not occupying at the time, and when he insisted on the presence of the fire and the furniture, the pictures, and the books with his own eyes. On these occasions—in summer as in winter—a blazing fire was kindled for some days previously in the large grate, and the charcoal was lit in the iron stoves in the Banqueting Hall as warm as circumstances would admit. As soon as the old gentleman's anxieties were set at rest the rooms were shut up again: and "Freeze-your-Bones" was once more abandoned for weeks and weeks together to the dogs, damp rats, and decay. The last of these temporary migrations had taken place only a few days since: the admiral had satisfied himself that the rooms in the east wing were none the worse for the absence of their master—and he might now be safely reckoned on as secure, for a long spring for weeks, and perhaps, if the season was cold, for months to come.

Trifling as they might be in themselves, these particulars were of serious importance to Magdalen, for they helped her to the limits of the field of search. Assuming that the admiral was likely to keep all his important documents within easy reach of his own eyes, Magdalen now feel certain that the Secret Trust was secured in one or other of the rooms in the north wing.

In which room? That question was not easy to answer.

Of the four inhabitable rooms which were all the admiral's disposal during the time of year—to say, of library, dining-room, the library, the morning-room, and the drawing-room opening out of the vestibule—the library was unquestionably the apartment in which, if he had a preference, he passed the greater part of his time. There was a table in that room with a drawer which locked; there was a magnificent Italian cabinet, with doors that locked, standing in a recess opposite under the book-cases, every one of which locked. There were receptacles similarly secured in the other rooms, in all or any of which papers might be kept. She had answered the bell, and had seen him locking and unlocking, now in one room, now in another—and he had always been alone. She had noticed occasionally that his expression was that of a man absorbed in what he looked round at her from an open cabinet or cupboard and gave his orders; and she inferred that something in the nature of his private and possession—it might or might not be the Secret Trust—implied some reference to the room where he had heard him, more than once, lock something up in one of the rooms—leave out and go into another. Not more than a few minutes—then return to the first room, with his key in his hand—and sharply turn the key, and use them again. Such trifling matters say about his keys and his cupboards might be the result of the old man's easy existence, and his constant habit of locking up and opening new to the experience of his later years. But there were other interpretations possible of his conduct as reasonably and as probably as the other. Which was the right interpretation of the two, it was, in the present state of her knowledge, idle to say.

The one certain discovery at which she arrived was made in her first day's observation of him. The admiral was a rigidly careful man in his habits.

All the smaller keys he kept on a ring in the breast-pocket of his coat. The larger he locked up together, generally, in a drawer, in one of the drawers of the library table. Sometimes he let them remain in the locks of doors; sometimes he took them up to the bedroom with him in a little basket. He had no regular times for leaving them or for taking them away with him: he had no discoverable reason for now securing them in the library and now in another, and now again locking them up in some other place. The unsteady willfulness and caprice of his proceedings in these particulars appeared to baffle all reduce them to a system, and baffled all attempts at calculating on them beforehand.

The hope of gaining possession of information to set on, by laying artful snares for him which he might fall into, was, therefore, one which was not, to be utterly futile. In Magdalen's situation all experiments of this sort would have been at the last degree perilous and dangerous in any man. With the admiral they were simply impossible. His tendency was to shout from one subject to another; his habit of keeping his tongue perpetually going, so long as there was any body, no matter whom, within reach of the sound of his voice; his comical want of all dignity and reserve with his servants promised, in appearance, much, and performed, in reality, nothing. No matter how diffidently or how especially Magdalen might presume on her master's example, and on her master's evident liking for her, the old man instantly discovered the advance she was making from her proper position, and instantly put her back in it again, with a quaint good-humor which inflicted no pain, but with a blunt straightforwardness of purpose which permitted no escape. Contradictory as it may sound, Admiral Bartram was too familiar to be approached; he kept the distance between himself and his servant more effectually than if he had been the proudest man in England. The systematic reserve of a superior toward an inferior may be occasionally overcome by the systematic familiarity, never.

Slowly the time dragged on. The fourth week came, and Magdalen had made no new discoveries. The prospect was now despairing in the last degree. Even in the apparently hopeless event of her devising a means of getting at the admiral's keys, she could not count on retaining possession of them unsuspected for more than a few hours—hours which might be utterly wasted through her not knowing in what direction to begin the search. The Secret might be locked up in one of some twenty receptacles for papers, situated in four different rooms: and which room was the likeliest to look in, which receptacle was the most promising to begin with, which position, among other heaps of papers, the most powerful might be expected to occupy, was more than she could say. Hemmed in by unfavorable uncertainties on every side—condemned, as it were, to wander blindfold on the very brink of success—she waited for the chance that never came. For the event that never happened, with a patience which was sinking already into the patience of despair.

Night after night she looked back over the vanished days, and not an event rose on her memory to dwell upon with interest on the other. The only interruptions to the weary uniformity of the life at St. Crux were caused by the characteristic delinquencies of old Mazey and the dogs.

At certain intervals the original ridiculous book-out in the nature of Brutus and Cassius. The modest comforts of home, the savory charms of female-thrift, the generous joy of digestion accomplished on hearth-rugs, lost all their attractions, and the dogs ungratefully left the house to seek distraction and adventure in the outer world. On these occasions the established afficer-dinner formula of question and answer between old Mazey and his master varied a little in one particular. "God bless the Queen, Mazey," said the admiral, "and the dogs!" were followed by a new inquiry: "Where are the dogs, Mazey?" "Out on the loose, your honor, and be hanged to 'em," was the wicked unvarying answer. The admiral always sighed and shook his head gravely at the news, as if Brutus and Cassius had been sent to the devil who treated him with a want of proper filial respect. In two days they had up in disgrace. On the day after they were scrubbed clean and were formally received into favor by the cook-room. There Civilization, acting through the medium of made-dishes, recovered its hold on them, and the admiral's two privileged sons wavered at the mouth as copiously as ever.

Old Mazey, in his way, proved to be just as distressingly addicted on certain occasions to his dogs. At intervals, the original wildness in Mazey's nature broke out, lost all relish for the comforts of home, and ungratefully left the house. He usually disappeared in the afternoon, and returned at night in a state in liquor could make him. He was by many degrees too seasoned a vessel to meet with any disasters on these occasions. Sometimes the dogs might take themselves about methods of progression, but they never failed him in the matter of finding their own beds, but they always showed him the way home. Try as hard as they might the servants could never extract from his personal fate that he was directly he always scorned the imputation. He even declined to allow them to drive privately into the yard until he had first tested his condition by a criticism of his own.

It was his habit in these cases of Bacchanalian emergency to stagger obstinately into his room on the ground-floor—to take the model ship out of the cupboard—and to try if he could succeed with the never-to-be-completed employment of setting up the rigging. On these occasions, when the tiny spars and snapped asunder the delicate ropes—then, and not till then, the veteran admitted that he was drunk, on the authority of practical evidence. "Ay! ay!" he used to say confidentially to himself, "The women call me Drunk again, Mazey—drunk again!" Having reached this discovery, it was his habit to wait unchanged in his inner regions until the morning was safe in his room, and then to ascend, in discreet list slippers, to his post. Too wary to trust himself with the treacherous bed—which would have been only inviting the catastrophe of a fall—he passed the night in a chair, and walked himself sober up and down the passage. More than once Magdalen had peeped round the corner of and had seen the old sailor steadily keeping his watch, and fancying himself once more at his post on board ship. "This is an uncommonly lively vessel in a sea-way," he used to mutter under his breath, when his legs took the liberty of getting adrift in a zigzag direction left him for the moment, studying the "Pirts of the Compass," on his own system, with his head against the wall. "A nasty night, mind you," he would meander on, taking another turn, "for the dogs." In the day-time, like the dogs again, he was reinstated in his privileges, and another change was introduced in the afternoon dinner formula. On entering the room the old sailor stopped short and made his excuses, with his back against the door. "Please your honor, I'm ashamed of myself." In that brief yet comprehensive form of words the apology began and ended. "This mustn't happen again, Mazey," the admiral used to answer. "It sha'n't happen again, your honor." "Very good. God bless the Queen, Mazey." The veteran tossed off his port, and the dialogue ended as usual.

So the days passed, with no incidents more important than these to relieve their monotony, until the end of the fourth week was at hand. On the last day an event happened, and the long-deferred promise of the future began to dawn. While Magdalen was spreading the cloth in the dining-room as usual, Mrs. Drake looked in and instructed her to do this occasion, for the first time, to lay the table for two persons. The admiral had written to his nephew, and had received an answer by mail that morning. Early that evening Mr. George Bartram was expected to return to St. Crux.

CHAPTER III.

After placing the second cover Magdalen awaited the ringing of the dinner-bell with an anxiety and impatience which, at any other time, it is easy task to conceal. The return of Mr. Bartram would, in all probability, produce a change in the life of the house, and from change of any kind, no matter how trifling, something might be learned by anyone who was keenly alive to influences which had failed to reach the uncle. In any case the two would talk of their affairs over their dinner, and through that talk—proceeding day after day in her presence—the way to discovery might be absolutely invisible, might, sooner or later, show itself.

At last the bell rang, the door opened, and the two gentlemen entered the room together.

Magdalen was struck, as her sister had been struck, by George Bartram's resemblance to her father—judging by the portrait at Combe-Raven, which presented the likeness of Andrew Vanstone in his younger days. The light hair and florid complexion, the bright blue eyes and handsome figure, familiar to her in the picture which hung in her memory, were the first points followed the uncle across the room and took his place at table. She was not prepared for the sudden revival of the lost associations of home. Her attention wandered as she tried to cover her face from her; and she stood in a state of waiting at table, for the first time since she had entered the house.

A hearty greeting from the admiral, half in jest, half in earnest, gave her time to recover herself. His nephew answered him in the same hearty and preoccupation of mind. He looked often at his plate than at his uncle; and at Magdalen more frequently than at either of a personal revelation took place. The conversation halted on irregularly, between public affairs on one side and private matters on the other—the fleet, the army, home and foreign, took their turn with the small household history of St. Crux—and the broken-hearted revolution which expelled Louis Philippe from the throne of France marched side by side with the dispute over the ownership of Mazey and the dogs. The dessert was put on the table; the old sailor came to—drank his loyal toast—paid his respects to "Master George"—and went out again. Magdalen followed him, on her way back to the servants' hall, with the first misgiving in the conversation of the slightest importance to the furtherance of her own design from the first week of it to the last. She struggled hard not to lose heart and hope on the first day. They could hardly talk again to-morrow, they could hardly talk through the next day or two. French Revolution and the dogs. Time might do wonders yet; and Time was all her own.

Left together over their wine, the uncle and nephew fell into easy-chairs on either side of the fire, filled their glasses, and, in Magdalen's absence, began the real conversation which it was Magdalen's interest to hear.

"Claret, George?" said the admiral, pushing the bottle across the table. "Help or look out of spirits."

"I am a little anxious, Sir," replied George, leaving his glass empty, and looking straight into the fire.

"I am glad to hear it," rejoined the admiral. "I am more than a little anxious myself, I can tell you. Here we are at the last days of March and nothing settled yet. I want you to see an end on the third of May, and there you sit as if you had years and years before you to succeed in."

George smiled, and resignedly helped himself to some wine.

"Am I really to understand, Sir," he asked, "that you are serious in what you said to me last November? Are you actually resolved to put me on the footing of your acknowledged heir?"

"I don't call it incomprehensible," said the admiral, irritably.

"Don't you, Sir? I am to inherit your estate, unconditionally, as you have generously settled it from the first. I am to succeed to a farthing of the fortune poor Noel left you unless I am married within a certain time. The house and lands are to be mine under any circumstances. But the money with which I might improve them both is to be arbitrarily taken away from me if I am not a married man on the third of May. I am sadly wanting in intelligence I dare say, but a more incomprehensible proceeding I never heard of!"

"No snapping and snarling, George! Say your say out. We don't understand sneering in Her Majesty's Navy!"

"I mean no offense, Sir. But I think it's a little hard to astonish me by a change of proceeding on our part, entirely founded on my experience of your character, and then, when I naturally ask for an explanation, to receive it coolly and leave me in the dark. If you and Noel came to some private arrangement together before you made his will, why not say so? Why set up a mystery between us where no mystery need be?"

"I won't have it, George!" cried the admiral, angrily drumming on the table with the nutcrackers. "You are trying to drive me into a badger, but I won't be drawn! I'll make any conditions I please; and I'll be accountable to nobody for them unless I like. It's quite bad enough to have worries and responsibilities laid on my unlucky shoulders that I never bargained for—— Now what worries have I? It's not yours, they've mine—— without being questioned and cross-questioned as if I were a witness! By-the-by, you're a pretty fellow!" continued the admiral, apostrophizing his nephew in red-hot irritation, and affronting himself to the degree on the burning for want of a better audience. "Here's a pretty fellow! He is asked to help himself in two uncommonly comfortable things in their way —a fortune and a wife—he is allowed six months to get the wife in (we should have given him a year, by-the-by, bagging, in six days)—he has a round dozen of nice girls, to my certain knowledge, in court for him, and sweethearts to spare, all at his disposal to choose from—and what does he do? He sits mouth after mouth—and I've been here six years—and he leaves the girls to pine on the stem; and he bothers his uncle to know the reason why! I call that a most unfortunate women! Men were made of flesh and blood—and plenty of it too—in my time. They've no made of machinery now!"

"I can only repeat, Sir, I am sorry to have offended you," said George.

"Pooh! pooh! you needn't look at me in that languishing way if you are," retorted the admiral. "Stick to your wife, and I'll be civil to you. Your good health, George. I'm glad to see you again at St. Crux. Look at that plateful of apple-cakes! I'll have you to finish them up in honor of your return. We can't hurt her feelings, and we can't spoil our dinners. Ha! ha! ——The admiral tossed four sponge-cakes in quick succession down the accommodating throats of the dogs. "I'm sorry, George," his old gentleman gravely proceeded; "I'm really sorry you haven't got your eye on one of those nice girls. You don't know what a load you're taking on yourself—you don't know what trouble and mortification you're causing me—by this shilly-shally conduct of yours."

"If you would only allow me to explain myself, Sir, you would view my conduct in a totally different light. I am ready to marry to-morrow, if the lady will have me."

"The devil you are! So you have got a lady in your eye after all! Why in Heaven's name couldn't you tell me at once? Here's Noel and I'll forgive you every thing now I know you have laid your hand on a wife. Fill your glass again. Here's her health in a bumper! Who-by, who is she?"

"I'll tell you directly, admiral. When we began this conversation, I mentioned that I was a little anxious——"

"She's not one of my round dozen of nice girls—ahn, Master George, I see that in your face already! Why are you anxious?"

"I am afraid you will disapprove of my choice, Sir."

"Don't beat about the bush! How the deuce can I say whether I disapprove or not if you won't tell me who she is?"

"She is the eldest daughter of Andrew Vanstone of Combe-Raven."

"Who!!!"

"Miss Vanstone, Sir."

The admiral put down his glass of wine untasted.

"You're right, George," he said. "I do disapprove of your choice—strongly disapprove of it."

"It is the misfortune of her birth, Sir, that you object to?"

"God forbid! the misfortune of her birth is not her fault, poor thing. You know as well as I do, George, what I object to."

"You object to her sister?"

"Certainly! The most liberal man alive might object to her sister, I think."

"It's hard, Sir, to make Miss Vanstone suffer for her sister's faults."

"Faults, do you call them? You have a mighty convenient memory, George, where your own interests are concerned——"

"Call them crimes, if you like, Sir—I say again, it's hard on Miss Vanstone. She is a charming little bit of pale all-reproach. From first to last she has borne her hard lot with such patience, and sweetness, and courage as not one woman in a thousand would have shown in her place. Ask Miss Garth, who has known her from childhood. Ask Mrs. Tyrrel, who passes the day when she came into the house——"

"Ask a fiddlestick's end! I ask your pardon, George—but you are enough to try the patience of a saint. My good fellow, I don't deny Miss Vanstone's virtues: I'll admit she's, may be, the best woman that ever put on a petticoat. That is not the question——"

"Excuse me, admiral—it is the question, if she is to be my wife."

"Hear me out, George; look at it from my point of view as well as your own. What did your cousin Noel do? Your cousin Noel fell a victim, poor fellow, to one of the vilest conspiracies I ever heard of—and the prime mover of that conspiracy was Miss Vanstone's unnatural sister. She deceived him in the most infamous manner; and as soon as she was down for a hundred pounds by the job she had the impudence ready to take his life. That is the truth—we know it from Mrs. Lecount, who found the bullet locked up in her own room. If you marry Miss Vanstone, you make this wretch your sister-in-law. She becomes my sister-in-law, legally. All the disgrace of what she has done; all the disgrace of what she may do—and the Devil only can foresee how far she will go—when I may go to next—becomes our disgrace. Good Heavens, George, consider what a position that is! Consider what pitch you touch if you make this woman your sister-in-law."

"You put your side of the question, admiral," said George, resolutely; "now let me put mine. A certain impression is produced on me by a young lady, which I have had many very interesting circumstances. I don't act headlong on that impression, as I might have done if I had been some years younger—I wait and put it to the trial. Every time I see this young lady the impression strengthens. Every time I speak to me, her character grows on me; when I am away from her I am restless and unhappy; when I am with her I am at the happiest man alive. All I hear of her conduct from those who have known her more than confirms the favorable opinion I have formed of her. The one drawback I can discover is caused by a misfortune for which she is not responsible—the misfortune of having a sister who is utterly unworthy of her. Does this discovery—an unpleasant one, I own—justify me forever all those good qualities in Miss Vanstone for which I love and admire her? No—but of the sort—it only makes me feel more deeply all the more precious to me by contrast. If I am to have a drawback to contend with—and we experts are all liable to that in the world—I would infinitely rather have the drawback attached to my wife's character than to my wife's sister's. I am not essential to my happiness, but my wife is. In my opinion, Sir, Mrs. Noel Vanstone his divorced mistress!—would be essential to her her do more mischief by depriving me of a good wife. Right or wrong, that is my opinion, Sir. You must excuse me if I argue with my questions of sentiment. All I wish to say is, that I am old enough by years, and by my own mind—and that my mind is made up. If my marriage is essential to the execution of your generous intentions as my godfather, I ought to one woman in the world whom I can marry—and that woman is Miss Vanstone."

There was no answering this plain declaration. Admiral Bantram rose from his chair without speaking, and walked gravely up and down the room.

The situation was emphatically a serious one. Mrs. Girdlestone's death had already produced the failure of one of the two objects contemplated by the Secret Service. If the failure of the second, the second George a single man, the second (and last) of the objects would then have failed in its turn. In little more than a fortnight at the very latest the Bans must be published in Grosjoy church—or the time would fail for completing the arrangements necessary to secure admission to the Trust. Obstinate as the admiral was by nature, strongly as he felt his objection to the step attached to his nephew's contemplated alliance, he recollected, in spite of himself, as he paced the room, and saw the facts, on either side, unfavorably staring him in the face.

"Are you engaged to Miss Vanstone?" he asked, suddenly.

"No, Sir," replied George. "I thought it due to your uniform kindness to me to speak to you on the subject first."

"Much obliged, I'm sure——And you have put it off to the last moment, just as you put off every thing else. Do you think Miss Vanstone will say Yes when you ask her?"

George hesitated.

"The devil take your modesty!" shouted the admiral. "This is not a time for modesty—this is a time for speaking out. Will she or won't she?"

"I think she will, Sir."

The admiral laughed sardonically, and took another turn in the room. He suddenly stopped, put his hands in his pockets, and stood still in a corner deep in thought. After an interval of a few minutes his face cleared a little: it finally ended with the dawning of a new idea. He walked round briskly to George's side of the fire, and laid his hand kindly on his nephew's shoulder.

"You're wrong, George," he said; "but it is too late now to set you right. On the sixteenth of next month I'll be down at the priory in Ossory church, or you will lost the money. Have you told Miss Vanstone what you mean to stand in? Or have you put that off to the eleventh hour, like every thing else?"

"The position is so extraordinary, Sir, and it might lead to so much misapprehension of my motives, that I have felt unwilling to allude to it hardly know how I can tell her, after all——"

"Try the experiment of telling her frankly. Let them know it's a question of money, and they will overcome her scruples, if you can't. But that is not what I had to say to you. How long do your prospects stopping here this time?"

"I thought of staying a few days, and then——"

"And then of going back to Combe-Raven to-day or to-morrow, I suppose? Will a week give you time enough to pick your opportunity with Miss Vanstone—a week out of the fortnight you have to spare?"

"I will stay here a week, admiral, with pleasure, if you wish it."

"I don't wish it. I want you to pack up your traps and be off to-morrow."

George looked at his uncle in silent astonishment.

"You found some letters waiting for you when you got here," proceeded the admiral. "Was one of those letters from my old friend, Sir Franklin Brock?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Was it an invitation to you to go and stay at his Grange?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Do it at once?"

"At once, if I could manage it."

"Very good. I want you to manage it, and you to stay at the Grange to-morrow."

George looked back at the fire, and sighed impatiently.

"I understand you now, admiral," he said. "You are entirely mistaken in me. My attachment to Miss Vanstone is not to be shaken in that manner."

Admiral Bantram took his quarter-deck walk again up and down the room.

"One good turn deserves another, George," said the old gentleman. "If I am willing to make concessions on my side, the least you can do is to meet me half-way, and make concessions on yours."

"I don't deny it, Sir."

"Very well. Now listen to my proposal. Give me a little time, George—a fair hearing in every man's privilege. I will be perfectly just to begin with. I'll attempt to say things that you honestly believe Miss Vanstone is the only woman in the world who can make you happy. I don't question that. What I do question is, whether you really know your own mind in this matter quite as well as you think you know it yourself. You can't deny, George, that you have been in love with a good many women in your time? Answer me the rest of them, you have been in love with Miss Brock. No longer ago than this time last year there was a sneaking kindness between you and that young lady, to say the least of it. And quite right, too! Miss Brock is one of the finest women of darlings I mentioned over our first glass of wine."

"You are confusing an idle flirtation, Sir, with a serious attachment," said George. "You are altogether mistaken—you are indeed."

"Likely enough. I don't pretend to be infallible—I leave that to my juniors. But I happen to have known you, George, since you were the height of my old knee-cap, and I mean to have this serious attachment of yours put to the test. If you can satisfy me that your whole heart and soul are at present in Miss Vanstone as you suppose them to be, I must knock under to necessity, and keep my objections to myself. I'll waste no more useless breath. Go to the Grange to-morrow, and stay there a week in Miss Brock's house. You have every chance in the world of lighting up the old flame again if she can, and then come back to St. Crux, and let me hear the result. You will see, as in duty bound, that your attachment to Miss Vanstone still remains unshaken, and you will have heard the last of my objections from that moment. Whatever misgivings I may feel in my own mind, I will say nothing—and do nothing adverse to your wishes. There is my proposal. I dare say it looks like an old man's folly to you—you don't believe that I have any trouble you much longer, George—and it may be a pleasant reflection when you have got your own way, to remember that you humored him in his last days."

He came back to the fire-place as he said this words, and laid his hand once more on his nephew's shoulder. George took the hand and pressed it affectionately. In the tenderness and remorse of the word his uncle had been a father to him.

"I will do what you ask me, Sir," he replied, "if you really wish it. But it is only right to tell you that the experiment will be unwise. I shall only succeed in proving my passing the week at the Grange to my passing it here, to the Grange's thinking."

"Thank you, George," said the admiral, bluntly. "I expected as much from you, and you have not disappointed me. His Majesty don't get us out of this mess," thought the wily old gentleman as he left the room, "but I'll take the ship," my nephew's weathercock of a head has turned steadily with a vengeance! We'll consider the question settled for to-night, then," he continued, aloud, "and call another subject. These family anxieties don't improve the digestion, I expect. The bottle stands with you. What are they doing at the theatres in London? Is any thing worth mentioning going on in private in the Navy. We used to like a good tragedy to begin with, and a hornpipe to cheer us up at the end of the entertainment."

For the rest of the evening the talk flowed in the ordinary channels. Admiral Bantram only once touched on the forbidden subject when he and his nephew parted for the night.

"You won't forget to-morrow, George?"

"Certainly not, Sir. I'll take the dog-cart and drive myself over after breakfast."

Before noon the next day Mr. George Bantram had left the house, and the last chance in Magdalen's favor had left it with him.

THE INDIAN MURDERERS IN MINNESOTA.

We publish on page 801 a very striking picture of the Execution of an Indian Murderer. One of the leaders of the late Indian foray into Minnesota) by a boy survivor who witnessed the massacre. The picture was also made the sketch from which our picture is taken kindly sends us the following account:

"After fighting two severe battles, the troops under the command of Brigadier-General Sibley succeeded in capturing the greater portion of the bands who committed the recent murders. The victims amounted in number to over one thousand, and many no doubt are still lurking in the woods, where they fled for shelter and were struck down. There is no record of a massacre so thorough in detail in the history of our country, fruitful as it is of Indian outbreaks. A short time since I was at South Bend, on the Minnesota River, and saw the captives. They are confined in a large pasture, and closely guarded, not so much to prevent their escape as to secure them from the violence of their outraged settlers. They are the most hideous wretches that I have ever seen. I have been in the prisons of Europe where the Malay pirates are confined—the Dyacks, who are the most fierce man and bloody of the Asiatic tribes—the Kaffir and Hottentot in appearance compared to these Sioux warriors.

"Quite an incident occurred while I was there. A boy who had escaped after seeing the murder and outrage of his mother and sisters was brought in to look at the prisoners, and, if possible, identify them. One of the friendly Indians, who had distinguished himself by his bravery and humanity, accompanied the party to act as interpreter. When we entered the log-house that served for a prison the captives were mostly crouched like bears, but one of them arose and confronted us with a defiant scowl. Another, supporting himself by an arm, surveyed the party with a look like a tiger about to spring. The boy advanced boldly, and pointed him out with unerring instinct. Subsequent investigation showed that this wretch had murdered eleven persons. The boy's eyes flashed as he told the story, and the interpreter informed us that the spectators could scarce refrain from killing the wretch on the spot. He received the last sullen glare, and seemed perfectly indifferent when told of his identification by the interpreter.

"I have seen many enemies with slaughter, and there is scarce a family in the large district that was the scene of the outrage that has not lost a relative; and many are entirely cut off, and nothing left to indicate their late but their devastated homes and the chance inhabitants of the prairies.

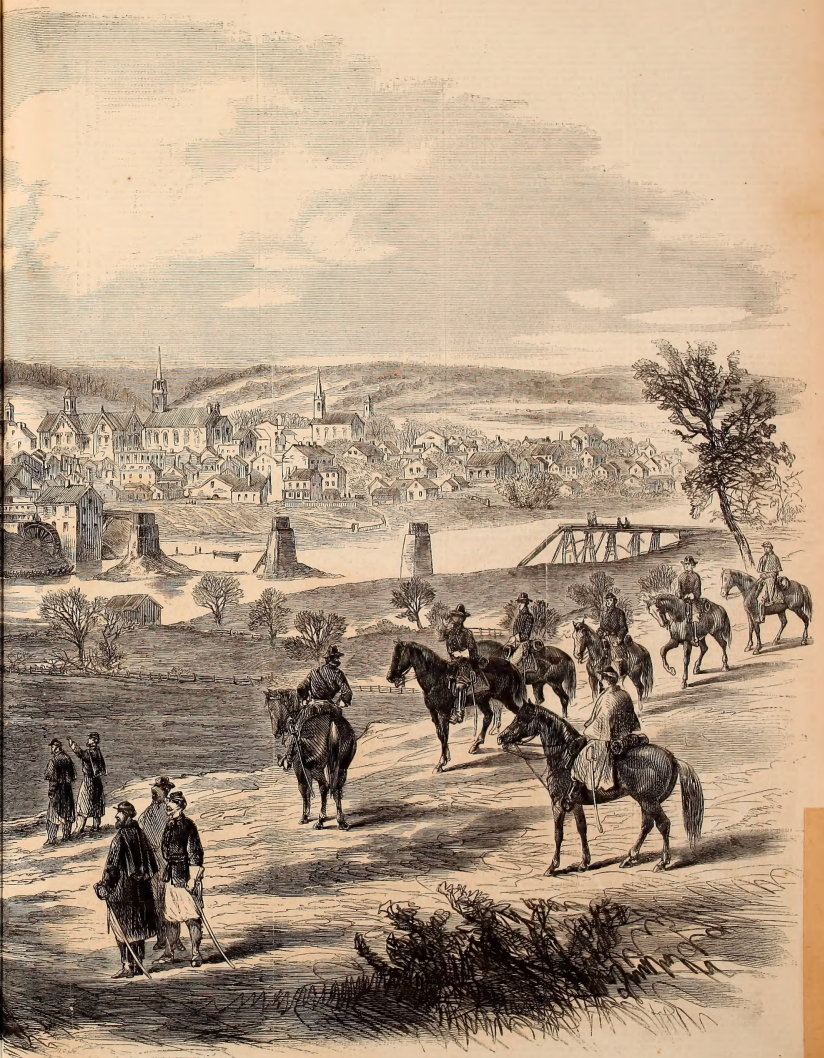
"It will be long before the frontiers of Minnesota will recover from this tragedy, and many of the settlers who have returned to their farms after the war will range the vast plains next to the Missouri, where they have hunted every Indian into the mountains."

THE ARMY OF THE SOUTH-WEST.

OUR artist, Mr. Simplot, has sent us several sketches, which we reproduce on page 805. Grand Junction, Tennessee, has long been one of the most important stations in the Southwest, and has been held by our army ever since the rebel evacuation of Corinth. It is from thence that Grant moves forward to compel the surrender of Vicksburg. Davis Mills is a position on the left wing of our army under Grant, and was lately occupied by Hamilton's Division. Holly Springs is a well-known spot to the army of the South-West.

BELLE PLAINS.

We publish on page 805 a view of BELLE PLAINS, the principal depôt of supplies for the Army of the Potomac. It is near Aquia Creek, where landed the thousands of bales, boxes, barrels, and cases of supplies are being accumulated as fast as they can be hurried from transports and hauled through the mud by overworked mules. The scene is characteristic, and the picture explains itself. It is from a sketch by Mr. THEO. R. DAVIS.



WINTER.

WHEN winter rains begin,
And trees are yellow and thin,
And every garden bed
Is a couch for the dying or dead;
When wood is sear and dank;
When the sodden river bank
Is gusty, and misty, and chill,
And birds are few and still;
Then may you chance to see
What has no right to be—
A primrose bracing its breath
In this time of sorrow and death,
A violet under a leaf
In this season of sickness and grief,
All alone, with the spring in the leaves and breath.

Or you may hear, perchance,
Across the brown wood's trance,
A sudden mid-May note,
Trilled out of a blackbird's throat;
As if he had got back
Which sweetened the lifeless air;
As if he had pleased his lady,
Which sweetened the loveless sky.
And see these relics which last
To tell of the bright days past!
Nay, but dear are these signs which are born
To hint of the coming morn.
Is it saddest or sweetest to feel
A breath from our childhood steal,
A gleam from the days of our youth,
Of tenderness, trust, and truth,
Of sweet emotions lost
Glide over our age's frost,
When the death-cold is near,
The dark hour which must be cross'd,
And beyond are the flowers of the vernal year

Dickens's New Christmas Story.

SOMEBODY'S LUGGAGE.

HIS LEAVING IT WILL CALLED FOR.

THE writer of these humble lines being a Waiter, and having come of a family of Waiters, and owning at the present time five brothers who are all Waiters, and likewise an only sister who is a Waitress, would wish to offer a few words respecting his Waiting; first hinting the pleasure of hereby in a friendly manner offering the Dedication of the same unto Jeremy, much-respected Head Waiter at the Slamjam Coffee-house, London, E. C., than to which a brillianter more eminently deserving of the name of man, or a more amenable honour to his own head and to the name thereof, could not be, in the light of a Waiter, or regarded as a human being, as not exist.

In case confusion should arise in the public mind (which it is open to confusion on many subjects) respecting what is meant or implied by the term Waiter, the present humble lines would wish to offer an explanation. It may not be generally known that the person as goes out to wait is not a Waiter. He may not be generally known as the hand as is called in actors, at the Freemasons Tavern, or the Albion, or elsewheres, as Professional; but he is not a Waiter. Such hands may be took on for Public Dinners by the landed and you may know them by their breathing with difficulty when in attendance, and taking away the victuals (or as it is half eat), but such are not Waiters. For you can not lay down the tailoring, or the dressing-gown, or the hooking, or the green-grocering, or the pictorial perficulating, or the second-hand wardrobe, or the small-beer businesses—you can not lay down those lines of life at your will and pleasure by the half day or permanent, as a Waiter can. Which I may suppose you can, but you can not; or you may get so far as to say you can, but you do not. Nor can you lay down the gentleman-waiterize when stimulated by perhaps circumstances, as the part of Cooks (and here it may be remarked that Cooking and Waiting is frequently spoke mixed and united), and take up Waitering. It has been ascertained that a Waiter is more than he may undertake at home he will not bear out of doors, at the Slamjam or any similar establishemens. Then, what is the reference to be drawn respecting real Waitering? You must not be bred to it. You must be born to it.

Would you know how born to it, Fair Reader—if of the adorable female kind? Then, I will begin the biographical experience of one that is a Waiter in the strictest sense of the term.

You were conveyed, we yet your dawning powers are were attentive thereunto, to the nursery, and eanoy in your inside—you were conveyed, by unerringless instinct, into a pantry containing the cat, mind Nelson, Civic and General Dining Rooms, there to receive by stealth that healthful sustenance which in the table and counsel of the British Female constitution. Your mother was married to your father himself a Waiter, and by the waiterly interest set secrecy; for a Waitress known to be married would only be a Waitress by sufferance in the eyes on the stage. Hence you being smuggled into the pantry, you were up all in a heap together, in an unwilling grandmother. Under the combined influence of the smells of roast and boiled meat, soup, and gas, and malt liquors, you partook of your earliest nourishment; you were conveyed, your mother sitting prepared to catch you when your mother was called and developed you; your grandmother's shawl ever ready to enfold you without complaining: your innocent mind surrounded by strong talk of steaks, fancy plates, chops-to-order, cold gravy; your mother calling down the pits for veals and porks, instead of lullabies to lull you to nursery rhymes. Under these untoward circumstances you were early weaned. Your mother and grandmother—ever growing more unwilling as your food assimilated less—had contracted habits of shaking you till your system curdled, and your flesh would not assimilate at all, all nourish for you was no longer spared, and could have been thankfully spared. Your mother's and your manners began to appear in succession, your mother believed, by the smart dressing (she had previously been a neat dresser), and her walk and delicate (which had previously been flowing), and loosened your father fare of nights, kept a bit hot for him through all weathers, up the shabby court which led to the back-door of the Royal Cock Tavern (said to have been so named by George the Fourth), where your father was Waiter. At the Duet-Bun was going down then, and your father took out Mrs.—according to the custom of the time—view. Your mother's object in those visits was of a humdrumming character, and was no more a relish your father out. Sometimes he came out, but generally not. Once or not once, however, all that part of his existence which was not connected with open Waitering was kept a close secret, and was known to your mother and yourself as a close secret, and you and your mother fitted about the room, there secrets left out, and you would scarcely have confessed under tortures that you knew your father, or that your mother knew your names that Dick (which wasn't his name, though he was always called so) or any other, for the life of him or his or chick or child. Perhaps the attraction of this was premature, perhaps the attraction having a damp compartment to himself, behind a heated with open Waitering was kept a close secret, and was known to your mother and yourself as a close secret compartment, with a sink in it, and a small, and a plate-rack, and a knife-board, and three windows that didn't match each other or any thing else, and the door-casual your young mind to feel convinced that you were born to the Waitering, but you did feel convinced of it, and so did all your brothers, down to your sister. Any one of you felt convinced that you was born to the Waitering. At this stage of your existence you were put to bed long one day when your father came home to your mother in more than usually high-spirits, and in a gladness on the part of a Waiter—and took to his bed (meaning your mother) rejoicing, and filled with the statement that his eyes were derided liddegrey. Everybody knew what it was, your eyes opened, after repeating at intervals for a day and a night, when years of reason and old business shifully illuminated his being. "Two and two is five. And three is sixpence." Interred in the parochial department of the neighbourhood, followed, and accompanied to the grave by as many Waiters of long standing as could be spared from long time from their soiled glasses (namely, one), your honoured father was laid in the churchyard, sandwiched, and you was took on from motives of benevolence at the Cock Tavern, principally for board and supper. Here, supporting nature on what you found in the plates (which was a Waiter's perquisite, but you often thoughtlessly immersed in mustard), and on what you found in the glasses (which naturally went beyond dribblets and lemon), by night you dropped asleep standing till you was cuffed awake and by day was set to polishing every individual article in the coffee-room. Your cheek being sawfust; your countenance being ashes of figure. Here, frequently hiding a heavy heart under the smart tie of your whitenecktanckher (or correctly speaking lower down and more to the left), you picked up the rudiments of knowledge from an extra, by the same means, from a Bill, from a toothpicker, and gradually elevating your mind with a bank on the Waiter's-more-honour system, which much time as you used the ink-stand when it was out of hand, attained to manhood and to to the full dignity of a Waiter.

I could with here to offer a few respectful words on behalf of the Waiter, as he is found in his own self and family, and the public interest in which is not too often very likely, but I do not understand, understood. No, we are not. Allowance enough is not made for, for, say that we are not, for the little drooping listlessness of spirits, or what might be termed indifference to money. Not to trouble you what would your own state of mind be if you was one of an enormous family every member of which except you was always greedy and in a hurry. Put it to yourself that you was regularly replete with animal food on the black beaver days of one in day and again at nine o'a., and that the repleter you was the more extensive were the calls upon your eats came in. Put it to yourself that it was your unfortunate lot to have a mother who was liable to personal interest and sympathy in a hundred gentlemen from one till five, and to have a wife (remount, only a hundred), whose imaginations was ever up to gentlemen in the City, and in the Strand, putter, and abandoned to questioning you about cuts of this, and dishes of that, and to pump you on them and you and the bill-of-fare was known in the world. Then look what you are expected to be as a Waiter. You are not to be greedy, which you regularly attend every where. Whats this, Christopher, Jeremy, Thomas, Richard, Robert, Jonathan Frim? How are they doing at the Italian Opera, Christopher? Christopher, you must be the real particulars of this business at the York-Minster Bath?" Remember, Christopher, you are liable to trouble that it gives the Queen. As to Lord Palmerston, the country is expecting something from which I have been brought with his lordship during the last few years is deserving of a pension, but I look at the Hyppotamus of the country in his lies (white, I hope) that are forced upon us? Why not a notorious character, that is to say, supposed to be a judge of horse-flesh, and to have a most extensive practice in the Veterinary line? Would it? Yet it would be half our little incomes out of our pockets, and that is the way to consult our private tastes. It is the same (inconceivables why?) with the Commissioners of Income Tax. It is not even to regular as the months of August, September, and October come round, and you are expected to put in my own private bosoms for the way in which I make believe to care whether or not the grouse is driven or the partridge is driven, and to have your stocks either signifies to me uncooked?), and whether or not partridges are driven to market by railway, and whether the pheasants is shy or bold, or any thing else not connected with Waiting. Is it nothing to me, or any other Waiter of my standing, boldened up by the Waiter's-more-honour system, a gentleman with his purse out and his bill before him, to be expected to care whether the Income Tax is collogued, for our credit's sake, to carry our heads as if we was all of us immensely rewarded for it, and as we was much more likely to go into a union. There is a Waiter's interest, in Income Tax, and Waiters are yet the present writer has quitted that establishment, and is now in his academy, commanding out of his own pocket, which screw carried the Waiter's interest, in Income Tax, to the extent of one threepence, and as often as not growling on the part of a penny which the Government, as a present writer as a large holder of Consols, a lender of money on mortgage, a Capitalist. He has been a Commissioner of Income Tax sometimes, in the position that the present writer put out thousands of pounds at interest, in Railway Shares, and Consols. "Well, Christopher," he would say (having grovelled to lowness of mind), "I could wish, considering." looking out for a House to open, eh? Can't find a House to be disposed of at a bargain for all your resources, bumph?" To such a dizzy pretence of ignorance of the Waiter's connection and wing that the well-known and highly-respected Mr. Christopher Bumph, Waiter, of the Cock Hotel, and by some considered the Father of Waiting, having found himself under the obligation to fall into the interest, in Railway Shares, of his own wife (for he had an unbeknown old lady in that line secretly attached to him), and to be in the way was the cosy quarrel? When he was borne to his grave, by Waiters, in a cab, and a coach-and-four, six more for a range, six more acting as pall-bearers, and all Waiters, the present writer was present, a dry eye visit, a and a concourse only inferior to Waiters, to pay the last respects, assembled to unchisel high as low for property and none was there. Hereby, in the Waiter's-more-honour, his last monthly col ection of walking-sticks, umbrellas, and parasols, and property which happened to have been not yet disposed of, though he had been through life unctuous in clearing off his collection of such, and by the Waiter's-more-honour interesting Such, however, in the force of this unanimous libel had been left to the Waiter's-more-honour present hour no inmates of the Almshouses of the Cork-Cutters' Company, Mr. Christopher Bumph identified sitting at the door of one of ten, in a coat cap and a flannel waistcoat (which Mr. Bumph), expects John's hoarded wealth to be found in a Stocking? Mr. John Bumph, Waiter, is a lively dart, and when his portrait was painted in 1815, life-size, by Abraham Cooper, R.A., Governor of the West Country to hang over the coffee-room fireplace of the Cock Hotel, there were those who contended that what is termed the accessories in such portrait ought to be the Bank of England out of window, and a strange-bone on the table. And but for better-regulated minds contending for a bottle and corn and the attitude of drawing—and carrying their point—it would have been so handed down to posterity.

I am now brought to the title of the present remarks. Having, I hope without offense to any Waiter, offered such observations as I felt it my duty to offer, in a free country which has ever dominated the same, on the general subject, I will now proceed to wait on the particular question.

At a moderate period of my life, when I was off, so far as concerned notice given, with a House that shall be nameless, I came to the question on which I took my departing stand was a fixed charge for Waiters, and no House as commits itself to that eminently Un-English act of more than foolishness and baseness shall be advertised by me—I repeat, at a moderate period when I was off with a House too mean for mention, and not yet with that to which I am now for since had the honor of being attached in the capacity of Head,* was casting about for a place. Then I was told that proposals were made to me on behalf of my present establishment. Such solications were necessary on my part, the solications were caused on both sides, and I entered on a new career.

We are a bed business, and a coffee-room business. We are a large general dining business, and so we wish it. In consequence, when diners drop in, we know what to give 'em as will keep 'em away another time. We are a Private Room or Family business, and that Coffee is not principal. Me and the Directory and the Writing Materials and cetter cetera are in a place to ourselves; a place fended off up a step or two at the end of the Coffee Room, in what I call a genteel old-fashioned style. The good old-fashioned style is, that whatever you do want, you don't want, you must be okay and solely dependent on the Head Waiter for. You must put yourself a new-born Child into his hands. There is no other way in which a business unringed with Coutinental Vice can be conducted. (It were useless to add that Coffee is always required to be jabbered and English is not good enough, both native-born gentlemen had better go somewheres else.)

When I began to settle down in this right-principled and well-conducted House I noticed under this bed (a, fig. 1), which it is up a single of the stair-case, and usually put off upon the lowlyminded) a heap of things in a corner. I asked my fellow-Waiters about it in the course of the day:

"What are these things in 24 B?"

To which the answer was a careless air:

"Somebody's Luggage."

Regarding which a eye not free from severity, I says:

"Whose Luggage?"

Evading my eye, she replied:

"I don't know, indeed I know I'm."

—Being, it may be right to mention, a female of some portness, though acquainted with her business.

A Head Waiter must be either Head or Tail. He has the main body extremely or the other of the social scale. He can not be at the waist of it, or any where else in responsibilities. It is for him to decide which of the extremities.

Which, on this occasion under consideration I give Mrs. Pratchett so distinctly to understand my decision that I have not yet heard a word upon it, then and there, and for good. Let not inconsistency be imputed to me because of my commending Mrs. Pratchett as "Mrs.," and having formerly remarked that a waitress must not be married. Mrs. Pratchett formerly requested to notice that Mrs. Pratchett was not a waitress, but a chamberlaid. Now a chamberlaid may be married: if Head, generally is married—or says so. It comes to the same thing. Mrs. Pratchett was a widow lady. (N.B. Mr. Pratchett is in Australia, and his name was Dick, as I have heard.)

Having took Mrs. Pratchett down as many pegs as I considered to be the advantages of all parties I requested her to explain herself.

"For instance, Mrs. Pratchett, to give her a little encouragement," who is Somebody's Luggage?"

"I give you my sacred honor, Mr. Christopher," answers Pratchett, "that I haven't the faintest notion."

But for the manner in which she settled her cappstrings I should have doubted this; but in respect to positiveness she was hardly to be discriminated from an affidavit.

"Then you never saw him?" I followed her up with.

"Nor yet," said Mrs. Pratchett, shutting her eyes and making as if she had just took a pill of unusual circumference, "which I am constitutionally force to her denial"—nor yet any servant in this house. All have been changed, Mr. Christopher, within five years, since which left the Luggage here before them."

Inquiry of Mrs. Martin yielded (in the language of the Bard of A 1) "confirmation strong." So it did really and truly appear, that Somebody's Maria in the young lady at the bar as makes out our bills; and though Maria, I could wish, considering her station, is perfectly well behaved.

Pratchett would not be led to the disclosure that there was a bill against this Luggage to the amount of five sixteen six. The Luggage had been lying under the bedstead for a few years six year. It bedstead is a four-poster, with a deal of old hanging and valances in the form of curtains, probably connected with more than 34 Bs—which I remember my honoured father used to call them at the time.

"I don't know why—when no to know why?—but the Luggage laid heavy on my mind. I felt a wondering about Somebody and what he had got and been up to. I couldn't justify my thoughts, but I could feel that so much Luggage agreed so small a bill. For I had the Luggage out within day or two and turned it over, and the following were the sum total of the inventorsness, a large bag, a desk, a dressing-case, a brown-paper parcel, a bedcase, and a carpet-bag, and a walking-stick. It was all very dusty and fluey. I had it opened up in the bar and set forth a tea and though he habitually wallows in dust—wines it from morning to night—he left off his tea and putting waistcoat with black calumnee sleeves for the purpose—put him rooster again, and the throat was that hot with it that it was obliged to put his cravat in front of Bessop's draft.

The Luggage so got the better of me that instead of handing it back when it was well dusted and washed with a wet cloth—previous to which it was so covered with feathers that you might have thought it had been the accessories to a fight, would by-and-by begin to Lay—I say, instead of making it part with its property, I went to all places down stairs. There from time to time I stared at it and stared at it till it seemed to grow big and grow little, and come forward at me and retreat again, and go through all manner of performances resembling intoxication. When this had lasted weeks—I may say months, no; not be far out—I one day thought of asking Miss Martin for the particulars of the Two sixteen six total. She was so obliging as to extract it from the books —if dating before her time—and here follows a true copy:

MEM.: January 1, 1857. He went out after dinner, directing Luggage to be ready when called for. Not so called.

So far from throwing a light upon the subject, this bill appeared to me, if I may so express my doubts, to involve it in a yet more lurid haze. Speculating it over with the Mistress, she informed me that the luggage had been advertised in the Master's time, but not to be sold under a term and such a day to pay expenses, but no further steps had been taken. It may here remark that the Mistress is a widow in her fourth year. The Master was possessed of a most delicate nervous constitution in which Spirits turns to Water, and rises in the ill-starred Cordial.)

My speculating it over, not then only but repeatedly, occasioned me the Mistress unawares with one, sometimes with another, led up to the Mistress's saying to me—whether at first in jobs or seriously I can not take and half remember—not to not

"Christopher, I am going to make you a handsome offer.

If there should meet her eye—a lovely like—may she not take it ill my mentioning that if I had been left a single year younger, I would have done as much by her! That is, I would have made her an offer. If a single year older, I would have made a handsome one.)

"Christopher, I am going to make you a handsome offer."

"Put a name to it, ma'am."

"Then, Christopher—Run over the articles of Somebody's Luggage. You've got it all by heart, I dare say."

"A black portmantean, ma'am, a black bag, a desk, a dressing-case, a brown-paper parcel, a bedbox, and an umbrella strapped to a walking-stick."

"All just as they were left. Nothing opened, nothing tampered with."

"You see, ma'am. All locked but the brown-paper parcel, and that sealed."

The Mistress was leaning on Miss Martin's desk at the bar-window, and she taps the open book that lays upon the desk—she has a pretty-made hand, for I seen her make it, and pretty feet, and laughs.

"Come," says she, "Christopher. Pay me compliments, and you shall have Somebody's luggage."

I rather took to the idea from the first moment; but,

"It wasn't be worth the money," I objected, seeming to hold back.

"That is," says the Mistress, folding her arms upon the book—it ain't her hands alone that's pretty made—the observation extends right up to her elbows—"Would you venture to stand seven shillings and sixpence in the Lottery? Why there's no limit to the prizes," the Mistress laughs and jobbing her hand again, "you must win. If you don't win, you don't pay. All prizes in this Lottery. Draw a blank, and remember, Gentleman-Sportsman, you'll be entitled to a blank portmantean, a black bag, a desk, a dressing-case, a sheet of brown paper, a bed-box, and an umbrella strapped to a walking-stick!"

To make short of it, Miss Martin come round me, and Mrs. Pratchett come round me, and the Masters she was completely round me already, and all the rest of them. The house come round me, and if it had been Sixteen ten instead of Two sixteen, I should have undertook to overlook it all the same.

"My family-name is Bliss Beard. I'm going to open Somebody's Luggage all alone in the Secret Chamber, and not a female eye catches sight of the contents."

Whether I thought proper to have the firmness to keep to this don't signify, or whether my feelings run away with me, and the money, I'm innocent when the opening of the Luggage came off. Somebody's Luggage is the question at present. Somebody's eyes, my set nest.

What I did at my leisure moment, in connection with that Luggage, is the extraordinary quantity of writing-paper I got through all weeks—I am not paper neither—not the paper charged in the bill for "Sweet writing paper," but the paper as I used always at it. And he had crumpled up this writing of his every day, in every part and parcel of Luggage. There was writing in his dressing-case; writing in his bed-case, writing in his desk; writing in his bag, writing among his shavings; writing in his sponge-bag; writing in his pockets; writing down among the very whalebones of his umbrella. All this writing of his, I say, I got through.

His dressing-case was poor—not a particle of silver or copper—nothing particular with nothing in it. His empty little dog-kennels—and a most scorching description of Somebody's character it would be to call under a deluded mistake that all the chinks in the fittings was divisions in teeth. His clothes I parted with, well enough, to a second-hand dealer not far from St. Clement's Danes, in the Strand—him as the officers in the Army mostly dispose of their uniforms to, when hard pressed with debts of honor, if I may judge from their coats and epaulettes diversifying the window, with their backs toward the public. The same party bought in one lot the portmanteau, the bag, the desk, the dressing-case, the hat-box, the umbrella, strap, and walking-stick. On my remarking that I should have thought those articles not quite in his line, he said: "No more ith a man'th grandmother, Mithter Chrithtopher; but if any man will bring hith grandmother here, and offer her at a fair trifle below what the'll feth with good luck when the'th thcoured and turned —I'll buy her!"

* Its name and address at length, with other full particulars, all editorially struck out.

These transactions brought me home, and, indeed, more than home, for they left a goodish profit on the original investment. And now there remained the writings; and the writings I particular wish to bring under the candid attention of the reader.

I wish to do so without postponement, for this reason. That is to say, namely, viz., i.e., as follows, thus: Before I proceed to recount the mental sufferings of which I became the prey in consequence of the writings, and before following up that harrowing tale with a statement of the wonderful and impressive catastrophe, as thrilling in its nature as unlooked for in any other capacity, which crowned the ole and filled the cup of unexpectedness to overflowing, the writings themselves ought to stand forth to view. Therefore it is that they now come next. One word to introduce them, and I lay down my pen (I hope, my unassuming pen), until I take it up to trace the gloomy sequel of a mind with something on it.

He was a smeary writer, and wrote a dreadful bad hand. Utterly regardless of ink, he lavished it on every undeserving object—on his clothes, his desk, his hat, the handle of his tooth-brush, his umbrella. Ink was found freely on the coffee-room carpet by No. 4 table, and two blots was on his restless couch. A reference to the document I have given entire, will show that on the morning of the third of February, eighteen 'fifty-six, he procured his no less than fifth pen and paper. To whatever deplorable act of ungovernable composition he immolated those materials obtained from the bar, there is no doubt that the fatal deed was committed in bed, and that it left its evidences but too plainly, long afterward, upon the pillow-case.

He had put no Heading to any of his writings. Alas! Was he likely to have a Heading without a Head, and where was his Head when he took such things into it! The writings are consequently called, here, by the names of the articles of Luggage to which they was found attached. In some cases, such as his Boots, he would appear to have hid the writings: thereby involving his style in greater obscurity. But his Boots was at least pairs—and no two of his writings can put in any claim to be so regarded.

With a low-spirited anticipation of the gloomy state of mind in which it will be my lot to describe myself as having drooped; when I next resume my artless narrative, I will now withdraw. If there should be any flaw in the writings, or any thing missing in the writings, it is Him as is responsible—not me. With that observation in justice to myself, I for the present conclude.

HIS BOOTS.

"Eh! well then, Monsieur Mutuel! What do I know, what can I say? I assure you that he calls himself Monsieur The Englishman."

"Pardon. But I think it is impossible," said Monsieur Mutuel.—A spectacled, snuffy, stooping old gentleman in carpet shoes and a cloth cap with a peaked shade, a loose blue frock-coat reaching to his heels, a large limp white shirt-frill, and cravat to correspond, that is to say, white was the natural color of his linen on Sundays, but it toned down with the week.

"It is," repeated Monsieur Mutuel: his amiable old walnut-shell countenance, very walnut-shelly indeed as he smiled and blinked in the bright morning sunlight—"it is, my cherished Madame Bouclet, I think, impossible."

"Hey!" (with a little vexed cry and a great many tosses of her head.) "But it is not impossible that you are a Pig!" retorted Madame Bouclet: a compact little woman of thirty-five or so. "See then—look there—read! 'On the second floor Monsieur L'Anglais.' Is it not so?"

"It is so," said Monsieur Mutuel.

"Good. Continue your morning walk. Get out!" Madame Bouclet dismissed him with a lively snap of her fingers.

The morning walk of Monsieur Mutuel was in the brightest patch that the sun made in the Grande Place of a dull old fortified French town. The manner of his morning walk was with his hands crossed behind him: an umbrella, in figure the express image of himself, always in one hand: a snuff-box in the other. Thus, with the shuffling gait of the Elephant (who really does deal with the very worst trowsers-maker employed by the Zoological world, and who appeared to have recommended him to Monsieur Mutuel), the old gentleman sunned himself daily when sun was to be had—of course, at the same time sunning a red ribbon at his button-hole; for was he not an ancient Frenchman?

Being told by one of the angelic sex to continue his morning walk and get out, Monsieur Mutuel laughed a walnut-shell laugh, pulled off his cap at arm's-length with the hand that contained his snuff-box, kept it off for a considerable period after he had parted from Madame Bouclet, and continued his morning walk and got out: like a man of gallantry as he was.

The documentary evidence to which Madame Bouclet had referred Monsieur Mutuel was the list of her lodgers, sweetly written forth by her own Nephew and Book-keeper, who held the pen of an Angel, and posted up at the side of her gateway for the information of the Police. "Au second, M. L'Anglais, Proprietaire." On the second floor, Mr. The Englishman, man of property. So it stood; nothing could be plainer.

Madame Bouclet now traced the line with her forefinger, as it were to confirm and settle herself in her parting snap at Monsieur Mutuel, and so, placing her right hand on her hip with a defiant air, as if nothing should ever tempt her to unsnap that snap, strolled out into the Place to glance up at the windows of Mr. The Englishman. That worthy happening to be looking out of window at the moment, Madame Bouclet gave him a graceful salutation with her head, looked to the right and looked to the left to account to him for her being there, considered for a moment like one who accounted to herself for somebody she had expected not being there, and re-entered her own gateway. Madame Bouclet let all her house giving on the Place in furnished flats or floors, and lived up the yard behind, in company with Monsieur Bouclet her husband (great at billiards), an inherited brewing business, several fowls, two carts, a nephew, a little dog in a big kennel, a grape-vine, a counting-house, four horses, a married sister (with a share in the brewing business), the husband and two children of the married sister, a parrot, a drum (performed on by the little boy of the married sister), two billeted soldiers, a quantity of pigeons, a fife (played by the nephew in a ravishing manner), several domestics and supernumeraries, a perpetual flavor of coffee and soup, a terrific range of artificial rocks and wooden precipices at least four feet high, a small fountain, and half a dozen large sunflowers.

Now, the Englishman in taking his Appartement—or, as one might say on our side of the Channel, his set of chambers—had given his name, correct to the letter, Langley. But as he had a British way of not opening his mouth very wide on foreign soil, except at meals, the Brewery had been able to make nothing of it but L'Anglais. So, Mr. The Englishman he had become and he remained.

"Never saw such a people!" muttered Mr. The Englishman, as he now looked out of window. "Never did, in my life!"

This was true enough, for he had never before been out of his own country—a right little island, a tight little island, a bright little island, a show-fight little island, and full of merit of all sorts; but not the whole round world.

"These chaps," said Mr. The Englishman to himself, as his eye rolled over the Place, sprinkled with military here and there, "are no more like soldiers—!" Nothing being sufficiently strong for the end of his sentence, he left it unended.

This again (from the point of view of his experience) was strictly correct; for, though there was a great agglomeration of soldiers in the town and neighboring country, you might have held a grand Review and Field Day of them every one, and looked in vain among them all for a soldier choking behind his foolish stock, or a soldier lamed by his ill-fitting shoes, or a soldier deprived of the use of his limbs by straps and buttons, or a soldier elaborately forced to be self-helpless in all the small affairs of life. A swarm of brisk bright active bustling handy odd skirmishing fellows, able to turn to cleverly at any thing, from a siege to soup, from great guns to needles and thread, from the broadsword exercise to slicing an onion, from making war to making omelets, was all you would have found.

What a swarm! From the Great Place under the eye of Mr. The Englishman, where a few awkward squads from the last conscription were doing the goose-step—some members of those squads still as to their bodies in the chrysalis peasant-state of Blouse, and only military butterflies as to their regimentally-clothed legs—from the Great Place, away outside the fortifications and away for miles along the dusty roads, soldiers swarmed. All day long, upon the grass-grown ramparts of the town, practicing soldiers trumpeted and bugled; all day long, down in angles of dry trenches, practicing soldiers drummed and drummed. Every forenoon, soldiers burst out of the great barracks into the sandy gymnasium-ground hard by, and flew over the wooden horse, and hung on to flying ropes, and dangled upside-down between parallel bars, and shot themselves off wooden platforms, splashes, sparks, coruscations, showers, of soldiers. At every corner of the town wall, every guard-house, every gateway, every sentry-box, every draw-bridge, every reedy ditch and rushy dyke, soldiers soldiers soldiers. And the town being pretty well all wall, guard-house, gateway, sentry-box, draw-bridge, reedy ditch and rushy dyke, the town was pretty well all soldiers.

What would the sleepy old town have been without the soldiers, seeing that even with them it had so overslept itself as to have slept its echoes hoarse, its defensive bars and locks and bolts and chains all rusty, and its ditches stagnant! From the days when Vauban engineered it to that perplexing extent that to look at it was like being knocked on the head with it: the stranger becoming stunned and stertorous under the shock of its incomprehensibility—from the days when Vauban made it the express incorporation of every substantive and adjective in the art of military engineering, and not only twisted you into it and twisted you out of it, to the right, to the left, opposite, under here, over there, in the dark, in the dirt, by gateway, archway, covered way, dry way, wet way, fosse, portcullis, draw-bridge, sluice, squat tower, pierced wall, and heavy battery, but likewise took a fortifying dive under the neighboring country, and came to the surface three or four miles off, blowing out incomprehensible mounds and batteries among the quiet crops of chicory and beet-root—from those days to these the town had been asleep, and dust and rust and must had settled on its drowsy Arsenals and Magazines, and grass had grown up in its silent streets.

On market-days alone its Great Place suddenly leaped out of bed. On market-days, some friendly enchanter struck his staff upon the stones of the Great Place, and instantly arose the liveliest booths and stalls and sittings and standings, and a pleasant hum of chaffering and huckstering from many hundreds of tongues, and a pleasant though peculiar blending of colors—white caps, blue blouses, and green vegetables—and at last the Knight destined for the adventure seemed to have come in earnest, and all the Vaubanois sprang up awake. And now, by long low-lying avenues of trees, jolting in white-hooded donkey-cart, and on donkey-back, and in tumbril and wagon and cart and cabriolet, and a-foot with barrow and burden—and along the dykes and ditches and canals, in little peak-prowed country boats—came peasant men and women in flocks and crowds, bringing articles for sale. And here you had boots and shoes and sweetmeats and stuffs to wear, and here (in the cool shade of the Town Hall) you had milk and cream and butter and cheese, and here you had fruits and onions and carrots and all things needful for your soup, and here you had poultry and flowers and protesting pigs, and here new shovels axes spades and bill-hooks for your farming work, and here huge mounds of bread, and here your unground grain in sacks, and here your children's dolls, and here the cake-seller announcing his wares by beat and roll of drum. And hark! fanfaronade of trumpets, and here into the Great Place, resplendent in an open carriage with four gorgeously-attired servitors up behind, playing horns drums and cymbals, rolled "the Daughter of a Physician" in massive golden chains and ear-rings, and blue-feathered hat, shaded from the admiring sun by two immense umbrellas of artificial roses, to dispense (from motives of philanthropy) that small and pleasant dose which had cured so many thousands! Toothache earache headache heartache stomachache debility nervousness fits faintings fever ague, all equally cured by the small and pleasant dose of the great Physician's great daughter! The process was this: she, the Daughter of a Physician, proprietress of the superb equipage you now admired, with its confirmatory blasts of trumpet drum and cymbal, told you so:—On the first day, after taking the small and pleasant dose, you would feel no particular influence beyond a most harmonious sensation of indescribable and irresistible joy; on the second day, you would be so astonishingly better that you would think yourself changed into somebody else; on the third day, you would be entirely free from your disorder, whatever its nature and however long you had had it, and would seek out the Physician's daughter, to throw yourself at her feet, kiss the hem of her garment, and buy as many more of the small and pleasant doses as by the sale of all your few effects you could obtain; but she would be inaccessible—gone for herbs to the Pyramids of Egypt—and you would be (though cured) reduced to despair! Thus would the Physician's daughter drive her trade (and briskly too), and thus would the buying and selling and mingling of tongues and colors continue until the changing sunlight, leaving the Physician's Daughter in the shadow of high roofs, admonished her to jolt out westward, with a departing effect of gleam and glitter on the splendid equipage and brazen blast. And now the enchanter struck his staff upon the stones of the Great Place once more, and down went the booths the sittings and standings, and vanished the merchandise, and with it the barrows donkeys donkey-carts and tumbrils and all other things on wheels and feet, except the slow scavengers with unwieldy carts and meagre horses, clearing up the rubbish, assisted by the sleek town pigeons, better plumped out than on non-market days. While there was yet an hour or two to wane before the autumn sunset the loiterer outside town-gate and draw-bridge and postern and double-ditch, would see the last white-hooded cart lessening in the avenue of lengthening shadows of trees, or the last country boat, paddled by the last market-woman on her way home, showing black upon the reddening long low narrow dyke between him and the mill; and as the paddle-parted scum and weed closed over the boat's track, he might be comfortably sure that its sluggish rest would be troubled no more until next market-day.

As it was not one of the Great Place's days for getting out of bed when Mr. The Englishman looked down at the young soldiers practicing the goose-step there, his mind was left at liberty to take a military turn.

"These fellows are billeted every where about," said he, "and to see them lighting the people's fires, boiling the people's pots, minding the people's babies, rocking the people's cradles, washing the people's greens, and making themselves generally useful, in every sort of unmilitary way, is most ridiculous!—Never saw such a set of fellows; never did in my life!"

All perfectly true again. Was there not Private Valentine, in that very house, acting as sole housemaid, valet, cook, steward, and nurse, in the family of his captain, Monsieur le Capitaine De la Cour—cleaning the floors, making the beds, doing the marketing, dressing the captain, dressing the dinners, dressing the salads, and dressing the baby, all with equal readiness? Or, to put him aside, he being in loyal attendance on his Chief, was there not Private Hyppolite, billeted at the Perfumer's two hundred yards off, who, when not on duty, volunteered to keep shop while the fair Perfumeress stepped out to speak to a neighbor or so, and laughingly sold soap with his war sword girded on him? Was there not Emile, billeted at the Clock-maker's, perpetually turning to of an evening with his coat off, winding up the stock? Was there not Eugène, billeted at the Tinman's, cultivating, pipe in mouth, a garden four feet square for the tinman, in the little court behind the shop, and extorting the fruits of the earth from the same, on his knees, with the sweat of his brow? Not to multiply examples, was there not Baptiste, billeted on the poor Water-Carrier, at that very instant sitting on the pavement in the sunlight, with his martial legs asunder, and one of the Water-Carrier's spare pails between them, which (to the delight and glory of the heart of the Water-Carrier coming across the Place from the fountain, yoked and burdened) he was painting bright green outside and bright red within? Or, to go no further than the Barber's at the very next door, was there not Corporal Théophile—

"No," said Mr. The Englishman, glancing down at the Barber's, "he is not there at present. There's the child though."

A mere mite of a girl stood on the steps of the Barber's shop, looking across the Place. A mere baby, one might call her, dressed in the close white linen cap which small French country-children wear (like the Children in Dutch pictures), and in a frock of homespun blue, that had no shape except where it was tied round her little fat throat. So that, being naturally short and round all over, she looked behind as if she had been cut off at her natural waist, and had had her head neatly fitted on it.

"There's the child though."

To judge from the way in which the dimpled hand was rubbing the eyes, the eyes had been closed in a nap and were newly opened. But they seemed to be looking so intently across the Place, that the Englishman looked in the same direction.

"Oh!" said he, presently, "I thought as much. The Corporal's there."

The Corporal, a smart figure of a man of thirty: perhaps a thought under the middle size, but very neatly made—a sun-burnt Corporal with a brown-peaked beard—faced about at the moment, addressing voluble words of instruction to the squad in hand. Nothing was amiss or awry about the Corporal. A lithe and nimble Corporal, quite complete, from the sparkling dark eyes under his knowing uniform cap, to his sparkling white gaiters. The very image and presentment of a Corporal of his country's army, in the line of his shoulders, the line of his waist, the broadest line of his Bloomer trowsers, and their narrowest line at the calf of his leg.

Mr. The Englishman looked on, and the child looked on, and the Corporal looked on (but the last-named at his men), until the drill ended a few minutes afterward and the military sprinkling dried up directly and was gone. Then said Mr. The Englishman to himself, "Look here! By George!" And the Corporal, dancing toward the Barber's with his arms wide open, caught up the child, held her over his head in a flying attitude, caught her down again, kissed her, and made off with her into the Barber's house.

Now, Mr. The Englishman had had a quarrel with his erring and disobedient and disowned daughter, and there was a child in that case too. Had not his daughter been a child, and had she not taken angel-flights above his head as this child had flown above the Corporal's?

"He's a"—National Participled—"fool!" said the Englishman. And shut his window.

But the windows of the house of Memory, and the windows of the house of Mercy, are not so easily closed as windows of glass and wood. They fly open unexpectedly; they rattle in the night; they must be nailed up. Mr. The Englishman had tried nailing them, but had not driven the nails quite home. So he passed but a disturbed evening and a worse night.

By nature a good-tempered man? No; very little gentleness, confounding the quality with weakness. Fierce and wrathful when crossed? Very, and stupendously unreasonable. Moody? Exceedingly so. Vindictive? Well, he had had scowling thoughts that he would formally curse his daughter, as he had seen it done on the stage. But remembering that the real Heaven is some paces removed from the mock one in the great chandelier of the Theatre, he had given that up.

And he had come abroad to be rid of his repudiated daughter for the rest of his life. And here he was.

At bottom, it was for this reason more than for any other that Mr. The Englishman took it extremely ill that Corporal Théophile should be so devoted to little Bebelle, the child at the Barber's shop. In an unlucky moment he had chanced to say to himself, "Why, confound the fellow, he is not her father!" There was a sharp sting in the speech which ran into him suddenly and put him in a worse mood. So he had National Participled the unconscious Corporal with most hearty emphasis, and had made up his mind to think no more about such a mountebank.

But it came to pass that the Corporal was not to be dismissed. If he had known the most delicate fibres of the Englishman's mind, instead of nothing knowing on earth about him, and if he had been the most obstinate Corporal in the Grand Army of France instead of being the most obliging, he could not have planted himself with more determined immovability plump in the midst of all the Englishman's thoughts. Not only so, but he seemed to be always in his view. Mr. The Englishman had but to look out of window to look upon the Corporal with Little Bebelle. He had but to go for a walk, and there was the Corporal walking with Bebelle. He had but to come home again disgusted, and the Corporal and Bebelle were at home before him. If he looked out at his back windows early in the morning, the Corporal was in the Barber's back-yard, washing and dressing and brushing Bebelle. If he took refuge at his front windows, the Corporal brought his breakfast out into the Place and shared it there with Bebelle. Always Corporal and always Bebelle. Never Corporal without Bebelle. Never Bebelle without Corporal.

Mr. The Englishman was not particularly strong in the French language as a means of oral communication, though he read it very well. It is with languages as with people—when you only know them by sight, you are apt to mistake them; you must be on speaking terms before you can be said to have established an acquaintance.

For this reason Mr. The Englishman had to gird up his loins considerably before he could bring himself to the point of exchanging ideas with Madame Bouclet on the subject of this Corporal and this Bebelle. But Madame Bouclet looking in apologetically one morning to remark, that O Heaven she was in a state of desolation because the lamp-maker had not sent home that lamp confided to him to repair, but that truly he was a lampmaker against whom the whole world shrieked out, Mr. The Englishman seized the occasion.

"Madame, that baby—"

"Pardon, monsieur. That lamp."

"No, no, that little girl."

"But pardon!" said Madame Bouclet, angling for a clew; "one can not light a little girl, or send her to be repaired?"

"The little girl—at the house of the barber."

"Ah-h-h!" cried Madame Bouclet, suddenly catching the idea with her delicate little line and rod. "Little Bebelle? Yes, yes, yes! And her friend the Corporal? Yes, yes, yes, yes! So genteel of him; is it not?"

"He is not—?"

"Not at all; not at all! He is not one of her relations. Not at all!"

"Why then, he—"

"Perfectly!" cried Madame Bouclet, "you are right, monsieur. It is so genteel of him. The less relation the more genteel. As you say."

"Is she—?"

"The child of the barber?" Madame Bouclet whisked up her skillful little line and rod again. "Not at all, not at all! She is the child of—; in a word, of no one."

"The wife of the barber then—?"

"Indubitably. As you say. The wife of the barber receives a small stipend to take care of her. So much by the month. Eh, then! It is without doubt very little, for we are all poor here."

"You are not poor, madame."

"As to my lodgers," replied Madame Bouclet, with a smiling and a gracious bend of her head, "no. As to all things else, so-so."

"You flatter me, madame."

"Monsieur, it is you who flatter me in living here."

Certain fishy gasps on Mr. The Englishman's part, denoting that he was about to resume his subject under difficulties, Madame Bouclet observed him closely, and whisked up her delicate line and rod again with triumphant success.

"Oh no, monsieur, certainly not. The wife of the barber is not cruel to the poor child, but she is careless. Her health is delicate, and she sits all day looking out at window. Consequently, when the Corporal first came, the poor little Bebelle was much neglected."

"It is a curious—" began Mr. The Englishman.

"Name? That Bebelle? Again you are right, monsieur. But it is a playful name for Gabrielle."

"And so the child is a mere fancy of the Corporal's?" said Mr. The Englishman, in a gruffly disparaging tone of voice.

"Eh well!" returned Madame Bouclet, with a pleading shrug: "one must love something. Human nature is weak."

("Devilish weak," muttered the Englishman in his own language.)

"And the Corporal," pursued Madame Bouclet, "being billeted at the barber's—where he will probably remain a long time, for he is attached to the General—and finding the poor unowned child in need of being loved, and finding himself in need of loving—why, there you have it all, you see!"

Mr. The Englishman accepted this interpretation of the matter with an indifferent grace, and observed to himself, in an injured manner, when he was again alone: "I shouldn't mind it so much if these people were not such a"—National Participled—"sentimental people!"

There was a Cemetery outside the town, and it happened ill for the reputation of the Vaubanois in this sentimental connection that he took a walk

there that same afternoon. To be sure there were some wonderful things in it (from the Englishman's point of view), and of a certainty in all Britain you would have found nothing like it. Not to mention the fanciful flourishes of hearts and crosses, in wood and iron, that were planted all over the place, making it look very like a Firework-ground where a most splendid pyrotechnic display might be expected after dark, there were so many wreaths upon the graves, embroidered, as it might be, "To my mother," "To my daughter," "To my father," "To my brother," "To my sister," "To my friend," and those many wreaths were in so many stages of elaboration and decay, from the wreath of yesterday all fresh color and bright beads, to the wreath of last year, a poor mouldering wisp of straw! There were so many little gardens and grottoes made upon graves, in so many tastes, with plants and shells and plaster figures and porcelain pitchers, and so many odds and ends! There were so many tributes of remembrance hanging up, not to be discriminated by the closest inspection from little round waiters, whereon were depicted in glowing hues either a lady or a gentleman with a white pocket-handkerchief out of all proportion, leaning, in a state of the most faultless mourning and most profound affliction, on the most architectural and gorgeous urn! There were so many surviving wives who had put their names on the tombs of their deceased husbands with a blank for the date of their own departure from this weary world; and there were so many surviving husbands who had rendered the same homage to their deceased wives; and out of the number there must have been so many who had long ago married again! In fine, there was so much in the place that would have seemed mere frippery to a stranger, save for the consideration that the lightest paper-flower that lay upon the poorest heap of earth was never touched by a rude hand, but perished there, a sacred thing.

"Nothing of the solemnity of Death here," Mr. The Englishman had been going to say; when this last consideration touched him with a mild appeal, and on the whole he walked out without saying it. "But these people are," he insisted, by way of compensation when he was well outside the gate, "they are so," Participled, "sentimental!"

His way back lay by the military gymnasium-ground. And there he passed the Corporal glibly instructing young soldiers how to swing themselves over rapid and deep water-courses on their way to Glory by means of a rope, and himself deftly plunging off a platform and flying a hundred feet or two as an encouragement to them to begin. And there he also passed, perched on a crowning eminence (probably by the Corporal's careful hands), the small Bebelle, with her round eyes wide open, surveying the proceeding like a wondering sort of blue and white bird.

"If that child was to die"—this was his reflection as he turned his back and went his way—"and it would almost serve the fellow right for making such a fool of himself—I suppose we should have him sticking up a wreath and a waiter in that fantastic burying-ground."

Nevertheless, after another early morning or two of looking out of window, he strolled down into the Place, when the Corporal and Bebelle were walking there, and touching his hat to the Corporal (an immense achievement) wished him Good-Day.

"Good-day, Monsieur."

"This is a rather pretty child you have here," said Mr. The Englishman, taking her chin in his hand, and looking down into her astonished blue eyes.

"Monsieur, she is a very pretty child," returned the Corporal, with a stress on his polite correction of the phrase.

"And good?" said The Englishman.

"And very good. Poor little thing!"

"Hah!" The Englishman stooped down and patted her cheek, not without awkwardness, as if he were going too far in his conciliation. "And what is this medal round your neck, my little one?"

Bebelle having no other reply on her lips than her chubby right fist, the Corporal offered his services as interpreter.

"Monsieur demands, what is this, Bebelle?"

"It is the Holy Virgin," said Bebelle.

"And who gave it you?" asked The Englishman.

"Théophile."

"And who is Théophile?"

Bebelle broke into a laugh, laughed merrily and heartily, clapped her chubby hands, and beat her little feet on the stone pavement of the Place.

"He doesn't know Théophile! Why he doesn't know any one! He doesn't know any thing!" Then, sensible of a small solecism in her manners, Bebelle twisted her right hand in a leg of the Corporal's Bloomer trowsers, and laying her cheek against the place, kissed it.

"Monsieur Théophile, I believe?" said The Englishman to the Corporal.

"It is I, Monsieur."

"Permit me." Mr. The Englishman shook him heartily by the hand and turned away. But he took it mighty ill that old Monsieur Mutuel, in his patch of sunlight, upon whom he came as he turned, should pull off his cap to him with a look of pleased approval. And he muttered, in his own tongue, as he returned the salutation, "Well, walnut-shell! And what business is it of yours?"

Mr. The Englishman went on for many weeks passing but disturbed evenings and worse nights, and constantly experiencing that those aforesaid windows in the houses of Memory and Mercy rattled after dark, and that he had very imperfectly nailed them up. Likewise, he went on for many weeks daily improving the acquaintance of the Corporal and Bebelle. That is to say, he took Bebelle by the chin and the Corporal by the hand, and offered Bebelle sous and the Corporal cigars, and even got the length of changing pipes with the Corporal and kissing Bebelle. But he did it all in a shamefaced way, and always took it extremely ill that Monsieur Mutuel in his patch of sunlight should note what he did. Whenever that seemed to be the case he always growled, in his own tongue, "There you are again, walnut-shell! What business is it of yours?"

In a word, it had become the occupation of Mr. The Englishman's life to look after the Corporal and little Bebelle, and to resent old Monsieur Mutuel's looking after him. An occupation only varied by a fire in the town one windy night, and much passing of water-buckets from hand to hand (in which the Englishman rendered good service), and much beating of drums, when all of a sudden the Corporal disappeared.

Next, all of a sudden, Bebelle disappeared.

She had been visible a few days later than the Corporal—sadly deteriorated as to washing and brushing—but she had not spoken when addressed by Mr. The Englishman, and had looked scared and had run away. And now it would seem that she had run away for good. And there lay the Great Place under the windows, bare and barren.

In his shamefaced and constrained way Mr. The Englishman asked no question of any one, but watched from his front windows, and watched from his back windows, and lingered about the Place, and peeped in at the Barber's shop, and did all this and much more with a whistling and tune-humming pretense of not missing any thing, until one afternoon, when Monsieur Mutuel's patch of sunlight was in shadow, and when, according to all rule and precedent, he had no right whatever to bring his red ribbon out of doors, behold here he was, advancing, with his cap already in his hand, twelve paces off!

Mr. The Englishman had got as far into his usual objurgation as "What bu—si—" when he checked himself.

"Ah, it is sad, it is sad! Helas, it is unhappy, it is sad!" Thus old Monsieur Mutuel, shaking his gray head.

"What busin—at least, I would say, what do you mean, Monsieur Mutuel?"

"Our Corporal. Helas, our dear Corporal!"

"What has happened to him?"

"You have not heard?"

"No."

"At the fire. But he was so brave, so ready. Ah, too brave, too ready!"

"May the devil carry you away!" the Englishman broke in, impatiently; "I beg your pardon—I mean me—I am not accustomed to speak French—go on, will you?"

"And a falling beam—"

"Good God!" exclaimed The Englishman. "It was a private soldier who was killed?"

"No. A Corporal, the same Corporal, our dear Corporal. Beloved by all his comrades. The funeral ceremony was touching—penetrating. Monsieur The Englishman, your eyes fill with tears."

"What bu—si—"

"Monsieur The Englishman, I honor those emotions. I salute you with profound respect. I will not obtrude myself upon your noble heart."

Monsieur Mutuel, a gentleman in every thread of his cloudy linen, under whose wrinkled hand every grain in the quarter of an ounce of poor snuff in his poor little tin box became a gentleman's property—Monsieur Mutuel passed on with his cap in his hand.

"I little thought," said The Englishman, after walking for several minutes, and more than once blowing his nose, "when I was looking round that Cemetery—I'll go there!"

Straight he went there; and when he came within the gate he paused, considering whether he should ask at the lodge for some direction to the grave. But he was less than ever in a mood for asking questions, and he thought, "I shall see something on it to know it by."

In search of the Corporal's grave, he went softly on, up this walk and down that, peering in among the crosses, and hearts, and columns, and obelisks, and tombstones for a recently disturbed spot. It troubled him now to think how many dead there were in the cemetery—he had not thought them a tenth part so numerous before—and after he had walked and sought for some time he said to himself, as he struck down a new vista of tombs, "I might suppose that every one was dead but I."

Not every one. A live child was lying on the ground asleep. Truly he had found something on the Corporal's grave to know it by, and the something was Bebelle.

With such a loving will had the dead soldier's comrades worked at his resting-place that it was already a neat garden. On the green turf of the garden Bebelle lay sleeping, with her cheek touching it. A plain unpainted little wooden Cross was planted in the turf, and her short arm embraced this little Cross, as it had many a time embraced the Corporal's neck. They had put a tiny flag (the flag of France) at his head, and a laurel garland.

Mr. The Englishman took off his hat, and stood for a while silent. Then covering his head again, he bent down on one knee, and softly roused the child.

"Bebelle! My little one!"

Opening her eyes, on which the tears were still wet, Bebelle was at first frightened; but seeing who it was, she suffered him to take her in his arms, looking steadfastly at him.

"You must not lie here, my little one. You must come with me."

"No, no. I can't leave Théophile. I want the good dear Théophile."

"We will go and seek him, Bebelle. We will go and look for him in England. We will go and look for him at my daughter's, Bebelle."

"Shall we find him there?"

"We shall find the best part of him there. Come with me, poor forlorn little one. Heaven is my witness," said the Englishman, in a low voice, as, before he rose, he touched the turf above the gentle Corporal's breast, "that I thankfully accept this trust!"

It was a long way for the child to have come unaided. She was soon asleep again, with her embrace transferred to the Englishman's neck. He looked at her worn shoes, and her galled feet, and her tired face, and believed that she had come there every day.

He was leaving the grave with the slumbering Bebelle in his arms, when he stopped, looked wistfully down at it, and looked wistfully at the other graves around. "It is the innocent custom of the people," said Mr. The Englishman, with hesitation; "I think I should like to do it. No one sees."

Careful not to wake Bebelle as he went, he repaired to the lodge where such little tokens of remembrance were sold, and bought two wreaths. One, blue and white and glistening silver, "To my friend;" one of a soberer red and black and yellow, "To my friend." With these he went back to the grave, and so down on one knee again. Touching the child's lips with the brighter wreath, he guided her hand to hang it on the Cross, then hung his own wreath there. After all, the wreaths were not far out of keeping with the little garden. To my friend. To my friend.

Mr. The Englishman took it very ill when he looked round a street-corner into the Great Place, carrying Bebelle in his arms, that old Mutuel should be there airing his red ribbon. He took a world of pains to dodge the worthy Mutuel, and devoted a surprising amount of time and trouble to skulking into his own lodging like a man pursued by Justice. Safely arrived there at last, he made Bebelle's toilet with as accurate a remembrance as he could bring to bear upon that work of the way in which he had often seen the poor Corporal make it, and, having given her to eat and drink, laid her down on his own bed. Then he slipped out into the Barber's shop, and after a brief interview with the barber's wife and a brief recourse to his purse and card-case, came back again, with the whole of Bebelle's personal property in such a very little bundle that it was quite lost under his arm.

As it was irreconcilable with his whole course and character that he should carry Bebelle off in state, or receive any compliments or congratulations on that feat, he devoted the next day to getting his two portmanteaus out of the house by artfulness and stealth, and to comporting himself in every particular as if he were going to run away—except, indeed, that he paid his few debts in the town, and prepared a letter to leave for Madame Bouclet, inclosing a sufficient sum of money in lieu of notice. A railway train would come through at midnight, and by that train he would take away Bebelle to look for Théophile in England and at his forgiven daughter's.

At midnight on a moonlight night, Mr. The Englishman came creeping forth like a harmless assassin, with Bebelle on his breast instead of a dagger. Quiet the Great Place, and quiet the never-stirring streets; closed the cafés; huddled together motionless their billiard-balls; drowsy the guard or sentinel on duty here and there; lulled for the time, by sleep, even the insatiate appetite of the Office of Town-dues.

Mr. The Englishman left the Place behind and left the streets behind, and left the civilian-inhabited town behind, and descended down among the military works of Vauban, hemming all in. As the shadow of the first heavy arch and postern fell upon him and was left behind, as the shadow of the second heavy arch and postern fell upon him and was left behind, as his hollow tramp over the first draw-bridge was succeeded by a gentler sound, as his hollow tramp over the second draw-bridge was succeeded by a gentler sound, as he overcame the stagnant ditches one by one, and passed out where the flowing waters were and where the moonlight, so the dark shades and the hollow sounds and the unwholesomely-locked currents of his soul, were vanquished and set free. See to it, Vaubans, of your own hearts, who gird them in with triple walls and ditches, and with bolt and chain and bar and lifted bridge—raze those fortifications and lay them level with the all-absorbing dust, before the night cometh when no hand can work!

All went prosperously, and he got into an empty carriage in the train, where he could lay Babelle on the seat over against him, as on a couch, and cover her from head to foot with his mantle. He had just drawn himself up from perfecting this arrangement, and had just leaned back in his own seat contemplating it with great satisfaction, when he became aware of a curious appearance at the open carriage-window—a ghostly little tin box floating up in the moonlight, and hovering there.

He leaned forward and put out his head. Down among the rails and wheels and ashes, Monsieur Mutuel, red ribbon and all!

"Excuse me, Monsieur The Englishman," said Monsieur Mutuel, holding up his box at arm's-length; the carriage being so high and he so low; "but I shall reverence the little box forever, if your so generous hand will take a pinch from it at parting."

Mr. The Englishman reached out of the window before complying, and—without asking the old fellow what business it was of his—shook hands and said, "Adieu! God bless you!"

"And, Mr. The Englishman, God bless you!" cried Madame Bouclet, who was also there among the rails and wheels and ashes. "And God will bless you in the happiness of the protected child now with you. And God will bless you in your own child at home. And God will bless you in your own remembrances. And this from me!"

He had barely time to catch a bouquet from her hand when the train was flying through the night. Round the paper that enfolded it was bravely written (doubtless by the nephew who held the pen of an Angel), "Homage to the friend of the friendless."

"Not bad people, Bebelle!" said Mr. The Englishman, softly drawing the mantle a little from her sleeping face, that he might kiss it, "though they are so—"

Too "sentimental" himself at the moment to be able to get out that word, he added nothing but a sob, and traveled for some miles, through the moonlight, with his hand before his eyes.

HIS UMBRELLA.

It was not in the spirit of officious gallantry that I put my best foot forward, in order to overtake the lady who was walking a few yards before me, across the large field which adjoins the pretty village of Ivyton. About the attractive qualities of her face and figure I did not care a straw, but she carried one potent charm about her which had for me a fascination wholly irresistible—she carried an umbrella. That the potency of this charm may be fully appreciated, I ought to state that the rain was falling in torrents, and that, although it was early in the year, I was not only without an umbrella, but was also destitute of an overcoat: having carelessly left one of those useful habiliments in the railway carriage. The shades of evening were just deepening into night, and I need not explain that the sensation of being drenched through by a rain which one can scarcely see, is infinitely more disagreeable than the attack of a shower in broad daylight. To the eye the appearance of rapidly falling rain is rather lively than otherwise, and to some extent counteracts the annoyance of a wetting. But in being made aware of the presence of moisture by the sense of feeling alone there is something incalculably dismal and desolate.

There was hope in that umbrella (a gingham umbrella). Surely, under the circumstances, I could solicit a share in it without being deemed extremely rude and impertinent. I slushed my way through the interminable field, and gained upon the figure. Its outline I could plainly distinguish. It was certainly a female, the dress was of a light color, and—most important particular—the wearer of the dress carried, as I have said, a very large umbrella—a gingham umbrella. More I could not ascertain, save that the object of my pursuit was endowed with a less amount of curiosity than is usually ascribed to the fair sex. As my feet often glided from the slippery path, and splashed into the small puddles by which in many places it was burdened, the noise I made must have been considerable; and most people are anxious to know what sort of a person is walking behind them, when they are in a field about nightfall. Such, however, was not the case with the lady before me. Armed with her umbrella against the inclemencies of the weather, she seemed regardless of every thing else.

As I have said, I gained upon the lady; but even when I was at her side, with my head under her umbrella (I believe I have already described it as a gingham umbrella), she made no effort to see me or to avoid me. Apparently looking straight before her, she went on as at first; and it is worthy of remark, that whereas I made a little splash at almost every step, she seemed to pick her way without difficulty. The few courteous words I uttered did not seem to reach her ear. Perhaps she was deaf? On this supposition, I gently took the gingham umbrella by the handle, politely intending to carry it in such a way as to confer upon her the largest share of its benefits. She made no resistance, but let it go at once, and, what was very strange, no sooner was it safely in my grasp than I found myself alone! Yes, no one was beside me; there I stood, whole and sole master of a gingham umbrella. Dressed as she was in light raiment, the lady, however rapidly she might have run away, ought to have been visible in some direction; but she was not visible in any direction.

How wrong it is to form hasty judgments. Five minutes before, I had settled in my own mind that the umbrella was the engrossing object of the lady's thoughts. Now, I could clearly see that she did not value it to the extent of a single clutch. If she had merely wanted to be freed from me, she might have gone with the umbrella in her hand, for I did not hold it so very tight. Perhaps the umbrella was more objectionable than myself, and she was glad to get rid of it? The rain that rattled on the silk seemed anxious to demonstrate the utter fallacy of this hypothesis.

I felt comfortable enough in the parlor of the Jolly Navigators, sipping my glass of hot brandy-and-water as a preventive against the ill effects of the wetting, smoking my cigar, and idly watching my—let me rather say the—umbrella, as it lay open before the fire. The inn was close to the station, and I by no means regretted that at least half an hour would elapse before the arrival of the train that was to convey me back to town. Literally doing nothing, I was ready to take an interest in any thing, and was not displeased when I could hear through the open door the few remarks made by the landlord and the customers at the bar.

"Well, this is leap-year," said a gruff voice.

"Yes, and more than that," said another voice, exceedingly shrill, and evidently belonging to an old woman, "this is the 29th of February. I wonder if she was in the field this evening?"

"Gammon," said the landlord,

"Oh yes, it's all very fine for you men," urged the shrill voice, "you'll believe nothing but what you can eat and drink and put into your pockets; but I tell you she's sure to be in the field about nightfall, on the 29th of February."

"Go along," said the gruff voice. "Why, I've been through Swampy Field over and over again, and I never seed nothing."

"Of course not," assented the landlord.

"Ay, ay," pursued the shrill voice; "but did you ever go through the field at nightfall, on the 29th of February? Were you there this evening?"

"Well, no; I can't say I was," replied the gruff voice.

"No; exactly," persisted the shrill old dame. "And are you quite sure you were there at nightfall this day four year—or the day four year before that?"

"Well, I don't want to say what ain't right and straight," replied the gruff voice, in a somewhat discomfited tone.

"And that's the wisest thing you've said yet," replied the shrill voice, reproachfully. "Better people than you or I have seen ghosts and been ghosts before this, to say nothing of poor Miss Crackenbridge."

Now my moral position, as I listened to the above conversation, with my eyes fixed on the umbrella, was far from elevated. I felt at once that the "she" of whom the old woman spoke could be no other than the mysterious female from whom I had received the gingham article that lay open before me, steaming away its moisture. I therefore knew that the sneers of the gruff gentleman and of the landlord were unjust, and yet I dared not openly enlist myself on the side of truth. My evidence was all that the old woman required to save her from derision, and I was base enough not to give it. The more I think of my conduct on that occasion the more does my self-respect diminish. If I had been in some primitive hamlet, where the existence of ghosts is admitted as a matter of course, there is no doubt I should have come out boldly with my narrative, and should have done my best to brow-beat any unlucky skeptic. My conduct, I am convinced, would have been analogous had I been at a party of fashionable spiritualists. But here I was in a village, too closely in connection with London to admit of a primitive credulity, save among the oldest inhabitants, while the social status of the speakers was not high enough to render them pervious to aristocratic spiritualism. For fear of incurring the sneer of a vulgar landlord and his more vulgar customer, I allowed truth to be assailed without uttering a word in its defense, though I could scarcely help fancying that the umbrella was conscious of my pusillanimity, and was observing me with silent contempt.

What a great man must a martyr be, who will undergo popular execration, death, and torture, rather than keep his lips close, when they can be opened for the assertion of a truth! What an immeasurable difference there must be between my constitution and that of—say St. Lawrence.

But while my moral courage was at the lowest ebb it was high-water with my curiosity. Such was my utter depravity, that the circumstances which depressed the nobler quality allowed the lower one to flourish with full vigor. I sneaked out of the parlor to the bar, endeavored to ingratiate myself by asking for something cheap which I did not want (a biscuit, I think it was), and then with the grossest affectation of vagueness, propounded the following question:

"Excuse the liberty, but did not I overhear—unintentionally, of course—something about some person who walked in some field in some remarkable manner?"

"That's right, master," replied a man in a shaggy great-coat.

"Oh yes, quite correct," said the landlord, "but for further particulars you had better address yourself to this good lady here. You know there's some sort of knowledge that thrives best in the heads of elderly ladies," he added, with a wink.

I am overwhelmed with shame and confusion when I write down the humiliating fact that I actually winked in return. If I were a member of parliament I wonder whether I should ever, by the remotest chance, find myself voting with the minority!

"Oh, the gentleman is quite welcome to hear the story if he likes," said the old lady: a most respectable, inoffensive-looking person. "I don't care for a laugh or two."

How unworthy was I to walk on the same soil with that heroic old woman!

I shall not repeat the words of her narrative, for it was somewhat prolix, and abounded in details that did not bear directly on the main subject. It will be sufficient to state that according to the excellent lady's belief, one Miss Catherine Crackenbridge had, on the 28th of February, many years before, gone out to meet a clandestine lover, and had been seen to cross Swamp Field. Since that time nothing had been heard of her. It was supposed that she was entrapped and murdered by a designing villain; some that she met with a fatal accident; and some that she committed suicide. This much was certain: that every 29th of February her figure might be seen—in fact, was destined to cross Swamp Field about nightfall by any person who happened to be on the spot.

After exchanging a look of bland superiority with the highest possible degree of scorn, I asked if the ghost were in the habit of carrying an umbrella.

"Ho-ho-ho!" roared the landlord. "Why, of course it is—what you want on a rainy night like this. Well, that's a good 'un. The gentleman has given it her there, and no mistake; hasn't he, Jo?"

The sun in the shaggy great-coat grunted his assent, with a low chuckle. And there was a wretch that I was—allowing myself to be applauded for inflicting a stupid sarcasm on a worthy old female, when I firmly believed every word of her statement, and was merely endeavoring to satisfy my curiosity with reference to my strangely-acquired knowledge. I was joined in the laugh, followed them all, the old woman included, to believe that I was completely abroad as a result of my witty and facetious person. The old woman mercifully observed that she knew nothing about umbrellas, and left the subject in a state of triviality that was not only justifiable, but highly laudable. As for me, I exchanged a look that spoke volumes in favor of a conjuncre by whom a worthy adversary has been valiantly vanquished.

My surprise was not small when I perceived that the umbrella had dropped into oblivion during the conversation at the bar. I had left it with the convivial side resting on a log, and consequently the handle in the opposite direction. Now the handle was resting on the bar, and the umbrella was in Longbaum toward the door. As no one had entered the room this movement was perfectly astounding, and did not appear to be explicable—that is, except on the umbrella, boldly tucked in under my arm, and stalked through the bar, bidding a good-night, well to the landlord, and making the untidy fireplace remark as I did not mind. I should meet it at the train. If all the ghosts of all the Hawkins had stood in a row before me, I should have rather have walked through them than have committed myself to a word, or gesture which would have compromised me in the eyes of the landlord and his great personal friend. As it was, the landlord's face C. C. carved on the handle confirmed my belief that the umbrella had been the property of the illustrated Catherine Crackenbridge.

The umbrella, I may observe, though of gigantic—one of no common order. The silk covering was extremely massive, and richly adorned with that elaborate kind of fringe which seems to indicate an Oriental origin. The initial letters to which I have referred had been scratched apparently with a first sharp instrument that came to hand, but had been elegantly executed.

Hence it was no wonder that when I called on my friend Jones, Esquire, to whom I was accustomed to proceed as soon as I quitted the train, he exclaimed, in his usual elegant style:

"Why, Bill, what's the stunning gingham you've got there! Well, that is an out-and-outer!"

"Yes, it is rather a good one," I answered, with considerable indifference; and I put it in the corner near the door and gave my hat and coat a conformity with an old habit of mine. Being of a careless disposition, I lose my umbrellas in the early youth. To prevent the recurrence of such accidents I gilt the ivory ferrule with my initials as a bat-peg whenever I make a visit. I can not easily forget my hat, my coat I hide it, but without handling my umbrella.

"Well, but you don't mean to tell me," pursued Jack, "that you mean that article with your own money? A purchase of that kind is not like my old friend Zachary Zachary."

"No; I did not purchase it—it came from India," I replied, with perfect honesty, but the little conscience that was left me, that I had not told an absolute falsehood; for, indeed, the umbrella did come from India in the first instance for any thing I knew to the contrary.

The intelligence I had to communicate was of a pleasant kind, and I proved it by ordering a cigar, a hot-and-strong for two, and a liberal effect by ordering every thing in the house in the supply of stout. When this supper, with the addition of a dozen of gog, had been disposed of, I rose to depart.

"Why, old boy," said the hospitable Jack, "where have you put your hat and your umbrella? Bless my eyes! they are! Why, I'll be hanged if I have sworn in any witness-box that you put the umbrella in the corner near the door, and then clapped your hat on the handle; and now—I do not behold—here is the hat on the floor, and there next the fire-place, and the umbrella, with the point inside the hat, and the handle against the wall!"

The little incident in the parlor of the Jolly Navigators had too well prepared me for such remarks on the part of my umbrella to startle me. It is just as I said: I put it, Jack," I said, with heedless effrontery. "You put a little too much brandy in your toddy, and it has gone into my directly after the stout—"

Jack was fairly under as I was, and as for the brandy-and-water, it had been offensively weak.

"I suppose you are right, old fellow," answered Jack, with a skeptical expression of countenance. "At the umbrella is a little dump, it was kind of you to save my carpet by using your hat as a basin."

Suspecting out some inanity about a friend's inventions being as dear to me as my own, I took no notice of the insult as well as I could. That I had not succeeded in obliterating from Jack's mind the unfortunate effect of the change of names after every words made evident enough. Though he never said the umbrella again, he never met me without some question as to its whereabout, or some reference to the old occurrence of that evening.

I had been so much occupied hitherto in wearing a mask before other persons, that I really had not had time enough to feel all the supernatural horror which the possession of the umbrella should have inspired. Here was an actual ghost in my hands, a supernatural female figure that had vanished like a ghost, and that figure exactly corresponding to the description of a ghost current in the immediate neighborhood! These circumstances began to impress themselves more forcibly on my mind when, on reaching home, I found myself alone in my bachelor sitting-room. The umbrella, which rested against my chair, appeared to me in the light of an unpleasant acquaintance, whom one can not conveniently turn out, as he is in no apparent press to stop. What should I do with the umbrella? I did not wish to sit up with it all night; still less was I inclined to take it into my bedroom. I looked suspiciously at the umbrella until I almost fancied it looked at me in return.

At last I betbought me of a little room on the first floor at the back, which I had once occasionally used for the deposit of lumber. Thither would I at once take the umbrella, and let it remain there in the sleeping apartment. How cautiously I carried it! I felt inclined to tread on the stair-carpet, who slept in the chamber adjoining the lumber room. I opened the door with a manner of voice that only a burglar ought to attain. I could almost fancy I was a burglar myself.

Lumber, insignificant by day, is ghastly at night. It often illustrates the proverb that misery loves a single spectator. The common household articles, once aside as unavailable for immediate use, and huddled together in a corner, have a fellowship with their original purpose, have a corpse-like appearance, and seem to shudder at the approach. ess. A cobweb floating about in their vicinity is as unconscious of supernatural power as a fly-spectator shrinks instinctively from any thing like contact with the ghostly appearance of a shadow, which seems to be compounded of feather, gossamer, and nothingness. I groped my way to the door.

I delicately placed the umbrella against a bonnet-rich covered with a profusion of dust, and withdrew to my bedroom; not without overhearing the shrill female voice of the servants, who had undeath remarked the unwonted sound of footsteps.

My dreams were disagreeable enough. The umbrella seemed to pursue me in the form of a many-armed but, the gingham forming the texture of the arms, which stretched out in every direction to the corners. Then the but would assume the shape of the human umbrella, and I would recognize the hideous Indian deity: with this difference, that the arms were not six in number, but a dozen, ranged around the neck, like the spokes of a horizontal wheel. And then the umbrella would suddenly be quitted its place, and stationed itself on the point, where it became the figure of a woman, and then it is unseemly mirth.

I was far from gratified next morning, when the servant, with considerable and toast, brought in the umbrella, with the words, "I think you left this in the passage, sir." I had not thought of it. I'm sure I felt that my answer gave no satisfaction. Though I did not look at the girl, I felt that she had taken an unfavorable view of my conduct.

"On the 29th of February, C. C. will call on Y. Z.," I said, with a sickly smile.

This was the advertisement on which my eye fell.

Now, it is not every one that can own a property in the 29th of Feb. Indeed, I am inclined to believe that I, Yorick Zachary Yorke, am their sole legitimate owner.

How great is the power of habit! Three years before, my mind had been so occupied with the existence of the 29th, that I had even tried to make a 29th of February of my own, by giving a figure to the 28th of March. Now, on the 29th of Feb., I was slow in recalling to mind the connection between the date and myself. I found it an assistion; and I believe a quarter of an hour elapsed before I recognized in C. C. the initials of the ill-starred Miss Catherine Crackenbridge.

The next day I received my new rent-roll forced back upon me. My agony reached its crisis, when, looking at the 29th in the paper, I detected the word "The 29th of February is to-day!" Practically I looked on that day as a holiday. I remained within its stand, and placed it on the table before me. My eyes were fixed upon it so firmly that every figure in the paper, and my own new rent-roll folded, but firmly pressed together, that I might be the bearer of the glad tidings of my own resolution.

How long I sat in this state I know not, but I am sure that I must have been sitting for hours, though I could not perceive a companion. And yet there was a strange consciousness in the presence of the room. The looking-glass was over the mantel-piece, the pictures were on the walls, furniture were in their places, but the carpet seemed to make of any person who was in the room invisible, affording a view of a fist country, in the last light of evening. I could not see the floor, but I could feel the of the drops. In defiance of all the laws of possibility, I was in two places at once—in my own bachelor apartment, in the Swamp Field. The weight rested on my arm, a cold breath was on my cheek, and close to my cheek was the face that bloved its lips, as if speaking with the greatest earnestness to the ear of the dead.

When the face had melted away, and the weight was removed from my arm, and the cold air was free from wet grass, and the walls had ceased to surround me, I found myself in a cab.

I am not aware whether any so called philosophical explanation of the above astonishing experience may be attempted. I believe I have related them with perfect truth. I was conscious of the fact that I had not slept, that I had not been in a trance, that I had not allowed my mind to be engrossed by any trifling detail, or if any deduction should be claimed by the determined skeptic, in the sense of mental strain, or of brandy-and-water which I have myself described as (I quote the exact words) "decidedly weak," or on the score of a rather confused memory, or a slight habit of absence of mind, or a constitutional disposition (inherited on the father's side) to doze after dinner, there will still remain this extraordinary circumstance to be accounted for by ordinary laws—that I found myself in a cab. I had been driven rapidly during the whole interval between Inkerstile and Longbaum, and unaccountably and unconsciously had lost the umbrella (till) on the 29th of February, the very day on which I had so carefully preserved, and brought with it the extraordinary man I have described.

HIS BLACK BAG

CREEVY was a dead bounce—a palace almost—in the west end of London, and I don't believe that even where in the north or the south, the east or the west, a pleasanter place could be found to stay at, or a pleasanter host and hostess than the Duke and Duchess of Greta. I had known the duchess long before her marriage, and as to her husband, we got on well from the very first day of my stay at Creevy. Soon I had the good fortune to land a salmon in a reyke the duke highly approved of, an achievement which I finished off by tying a fly which he himself killed first and last five large salmon, and five grilse, during the week. Indeed, I may say, I went to stay at Creevy, making one of a great society, the castle being big enough to hold a small world within its walls.

There was a busy arrival at Creevy on the occasion which I am writing. I found myself seated between old Lady Saltcliffe, who is very deaf, and an uncommonly stupid master of fox-hounds, whose voice nobody would ever care to hear unless when it was raised in a melodious tally-ho or stirring words of encouragement to a despondent hound. Exactly opposite to where I sat, but beautiful Miss Crawcour. Of this young lady I had heard a great deal, though I had never before had any personal affair to be company. She was placed next to the duke, and I knew from whom I knew, I was the last inking. This was Lord Saxcly, the best match, presumably, and the richest, in England, and every other way, that England had to show. At a time when I was not going on. Miss Crawcour was a near relation of the duchess, and the duchess was one of those inventive matchmakers that never lived. She was at this time about five or six-and-thirty, good looking, and possessed of an excess, but she had this quality of match-making developed in her nature to an extent that was almost inconceivable, and certainly premature.

But the duchess did not stand alone in keeping the matrimonial eye upon Miss Crawcour. Another friend, from whom I learned who the young lady was before I knew myself, was Mrs. Crawcour, and eye fixed upon Miss Crawcour. Lady Saltcliffe, deaf, I have said, and stupid as to conversation, watched her with might and main, and an, indeed, more or less, and most of the guests throughout found that great table. I ought, perhaps, to except the duke, who was himself engaged to all such matters, being a sportsman and nothing else in the world. But the curiosity of those in the company was excusable. One of the special beauties of the day, one of the most lovely women of the year, were there side by side, and of course every body wanted to know what would come of it.

The beauty of Mary Crawcour was an only one, and there was in it a wonderful sense of health and vitality. It was enough to make one look at her without feeling inclined to envy her the extraordinary amount of life and enjoyment future which an organism so complete seemed to promise. Mrs. What a mother she would be! Mrs. Saltcliffe—what a pity it would be if any thing should occur to her husband! Mrs. Lord Saxcly—I looked from her to her neighbor the thought immediately followed, "I wonder if any one ever could think by such an alliance as that?"

Plain, Mrs. Saxcly was not what some people would call bad-looking, though to me I must own that his appearance was most disagreeable. I suppose at the time I am speaking of he was two or three-and-forty, but he was one of those light-complexioned men who look less than they are. His features, too, were small and regular. What must have been his age I could not tell, but I remember to look at than this same Lord Saxcly, whom was then a most extraordinary anxiety to know about him. He was so much too soigné in his "get up," his hair was a shade too golden, and his teeth a trifle whiskers. He affected jewelry, and I have frequently seen him with rings outside his gloves. He always wore, too, such tightly-strapped trousers and such thick lacquered boots, that I felt as he had cut a thing as a shooting-jacket or a pair of highlows in his possession. When the other guests left the table, I found that, for a couple of days, he was to be found in the drawing-room, playing on the piano, or, still better, making himself to accompany him while he sang; for I must say for him that he had a very fine and sweet voice, and performed upon it in tune and with considerable skill.

I looked on then at this game, and I saw, or thought I saw, nothing? A scientific man who had never had any thing but a pippin for a heart—that small pippin, however, with a certain sour juice and softness in it, but now resembling those of a hardened crab. Lord Saxcly was a man without any, hard, and sadly contracted and pinched about the core. I saw that this man had settled within himself that the young lady before him was a personality and otherwise suitable to the position of duchess of Greta, and that with the exception of such a piece of humanity would be generally acceptable to the world, and that he would be fair discernment into the bargain. I saw, too, a young girl, at her very commencement of womanhood in a bright and glorious existence, about to sacrifice all her happiness for the mere selling for money and a coronet, and I thought I saw that this was not done without a pang at some point of time, but because she was forced into it.

Sitting there, and pretending to bring little to do in the way of conversation myself, I heard many scraps of dialogue between Miss Crawcour and her neighbor. Once, among high matters of state, Lord Saxcly said, certainly, but always with great politeness. The duchess was a little deaf.

A great dinner! What a wondrous jumble of thought, what a confusion of ideas, what a tangle of observations made aloud and observations made in secret. What scraps overheard! What nonsense. If sound and thought and action could be telegraphed by wires, what a confusion of shouts, and retained, what would be the result of the process? It is to be hoped with which we have to do something of this sort. Quick! The instrument must, the shifting of the scenes must be constant and prepared plate exposed.

LADY SALTCLIFFE (to me).—Do you like venison?

MYSELF (to Lady Saltcliffe).—Myself (bawling). No. They didn't come to town at all.—BUTLER (over right shoulder). Champagne, sir.—Sporting cock.—MYSELF (to myself). Feverish last night. —Butler (behind my chair). Champagne, sir.—Well, they couldn't have been a nicer house.—MYSELF (to Lady Saltcliffe). It's no use trying that right (to Lady S., bawling louder). No.—LORD SAXCLY (to Miss Crawcour). Have you ever been? Yes, to rough it or. I have an aversion to roughing it.—Miss CRAWCOUR (to Lord Saxcly). Do you like left shoulder). No, thanks.—MYSELF (to Miss Crawcour). Oh, not very dreadful. I have been accustomed to it from the person I am with who was at the other end of the world.—LORD SAXCLY (calmly). In that case it is no use to go. Myself (to myself). I should like at least half of my friends to be at the other end of the world.—

MYSELF (to myself). How she hates him; (to servant, protruding curry over left shoulder) No.—GENERAL ACCOMPANIMENT. Muffled clash, respectful clatter, buzzing, and subdued laughter.—MASTER OF FOXHOUNDS (to me). Shall you be in England for the hunting season?—MYSELF. Don't intend to hunt next season.—M. F. H. What's become of that chestnut of yours?—MYSELF. Sold her.—LADY SALTEITH (to me). Miss Crawcour is not so pretty as she was last year.—MYSELF (observing Miss Crawcour to be listening). I can't agree with you there, Lady Salteith; (to myself) I've never seen her before, by-the-by; (to servant, protruding mutton over left shoulder) Yes.—BUTLER (over right shoulder). Champagne or sparkling 'ock, Sir?—MYSELF. Neither.—LORD SNEYD (to Miss Crawcour). Did you hear Lady Salteith just now (his lordship was devouring curry when Lady Salteith spoke, and is only now ready to talk)?—MISS CRAWCOUR. Yes.—LORD SNEYD. Does that make you angry?—MISS CRAWCOUR. No. Lady Salteith is quite right.—GENERAL ACCOMPANIMENT. Muffled clash, respectful clatter, and subdued laughter.—M. F. H. I know a man who would have given you any thing for that chestnut.—MYSELF. Yes? Well, it's too late now. I sold him very well.—BUTLER (over right shoulder). Sherry, Sir?—MYSELF. Thanks.—LADY SALTEITH (to me). Not a good complexion has she?—MYSELF (shouting). I can't agree with you, Lady Salteith.—LADY SALTEITH. Yes, as you say, wants color.—MYSELF (to myself). It's no use; (to servant, protruding grouse over left shoulder) If you please.—LORD SNEYD (to Miss Crawcour). What are you going to do to-morrow morning, Miss Crawcour? Will you try that air from the Prophète with me again?—MISS CRAWCOUR. In the morning I am going out riding, Lord Sneyd.—LORD SNEYD. Dear me. You are always riding. I hate riding, it shakes one so. Well, in the afternoon, then, after luncheon?—MISS CRAWCOUR (icily). After luncheon I shall be quite ready.—MYSELF (to myself, being inclined for meditation). That girl speaks with the air of a martyr. If I had been Lord Sneyd—(to servant, protruding Charlotte-Russe over left shoulder) No—(to myself) I would have made an effort to accompany myself in that air from the Prophète, or have sought a more willing coadjutor; (to servant, protruding jelly over left shoulder) No, thank you.—GENERAL ACCOMPANIMENT. Muffled clash, respectful clatter, buzzing, and subdued laughter.—M. F. H. (to a neighbor). We've begun the cub-hunting now regularly. My huntsman tells me there are a good many foxes this year.—NEIGHBOR (another fox-hunter, indistinctly reported by the instrument). Glad—hear it—good f. country—plenty—cover.—LADY SALTEITH (to me). Do you ever see my nephew now?—MYSELF. What, Harry Rushout? Oh yes, sometimes.—LADY SALTEITH (to her neighbor on the other side). My nephew is the wildest young man about town. The other day he got brought up before the magistrate and— LORD SNEYD (to Miss Crawcour). Lady Salteith is not always so fortunate as she might be in the subjects she chooses for conversation.—MISS CRAWCOUR. Poor thing. She belongs to a different time. But she's very good, really.—LORD SNEYD. I wonder she comes out, so deaf as she is. She ought to stop at home.—MISS CRAWCOUR. I like Lady Salteith exceedingly, and am always glad to be staying in the house with her.—MYSELF. That's right.—GENERAL ACCOMPANIMENT. Clash—clatter.

Enough! Down goes the slide. The instrument is shut up. There is the result of the operation.

When that long "banquet scene" was at an end, and the ladies left the room, I found myself, by the retirement of old Lady Salteith, next my hearty straightforward manly friend Jack Fortescue, with whom I had already exchanged a nod behind the old lady's back. I was very glad to see him. We talked about all sorts of things; and presently got upon the subject which had been occupying me so much during dinner. I was rather anxious, I must own, to lead to it, having heard a rumor somewhere or other that my friend Jack himself was smitten with Miss Crawcour. I don't know when I had heard it, or where. Those things seem in some societies to circulate in the air.

To my surprise I found Fortescue very uncommunicative about this matter, and still more, to my wonder, I observed a tendency in him rather favorable to this match. He even sought to defend Lord Sneyd against my attacks.

"Oh, he's not such a bad fellow," he said, "when you come to know him. He's affected, you know, and pretends to be wonderfully refined, and to be a petit-maître, and all that, but he has his good points. We fellows who are always shooting, or fishing, or riding over stone dykes, are apt to undervalue a man of quieter tastes, and more sedentary pursuits. Sneyd goes in, you know, for being a sort of artist. By-the-by—talking of artists—did you see that portrait of the duchess in the Academy this year—wasn't it good?"

I saw that my friend wanted to get away from the subject, so of course I did not attempt to pursue it. I was not enlightened by any thing that occurred in the drawing-room after dinner. Miss Crawcour and Fortescue hardly exchanged a dozen words, and Lord Sneyd was in attendance upon the young lady throughout the evening. In the smoking-room afterward Lord Sneyd refused cigars, and smoked some infernal perfumed composition out of a Hookah. Heaven knows what it was. Opium, perhaps? Nothing wholesome I'll warrant.

II.

It was on the day succeeding that of my arrival at Creel that I sought the billiard-room, the usual refuge of the unemployed. I had remained at home that morning, having some letters to write and other things to do in my own room. These finished, I had still half an hour or more on my hands before luncheon, so I thought I would wend my way to the billiard-room. If I found any one to play with so much the better. If not, I would practice difficult cannons for half an hour or so, and in that way get through the time.

Two people were in the room. A gentleman and a lady. Jack Fortescue and Miss Crawcour. They were standing together at the further end of the table. Both had cues in their hands, and the balls were on the board, but at the moment of my entrance they were certainly not playing. Miss Crawcour's back was to the light, but a glance showed me beyond a shadow of doubt that she had been crying—was crying even when I entered the room.

What was I to do? Fortescue was my friend. The room was public to every body in the castle. If I retired it would be a marked act, showing that I felt I had interrupted some scene which did not require witnesses.

"Are you having a game, or only practicing?" I said to Fortescue, merely to break the awkward silence.

"Oh, it's a game," he answered, making a great effort, but not speaking then in his proper voice. "And it's my stroke. Look," he said to me, quickly, "is that cannon possible?" and he made it almost as he spoke. Two or three more followed. Then a hazard. At last a bad shot, and it was time for Miss Crawcour.

She came to her place at the table, and made a violent effort to collect herself. I did not look at her, but pretended to be absorbed in marking Fortescue's score. I heard her cue strike the ball in an uncertain way. There was no subsequent sound indicating the contact of her ball with one of the others. It was a miss. The moment she had made it she placed her cue against the wall, and saying something indistinctly about not being able to play, and about my finishing the game instead of her, left the billiard-room, closing the door after her.

As soon as she was gone Fortescue came up to where I stood.

"After what you've seen," he said, "it's no use my attempting to make a secret of what has been going on between Miss Crawcour and myself."

"My dear Fortescue, I have no wish to force myself on your confidence. What I have seen can be forever as if I had not seen it, if you wish it. You know that."

"No, no, I don't wish it," he answered, quickly. "But come outside with me for half a minute. We can't talk here."

Out in the open air, the rooks cawing about the tree-tops as their nests waved to and fro in the wind, he spoke again, as we lay on the grass.

"I dare say you have heard my name and Miss Crawcour's spoken of together? You have. I don't know what right any one has had to talk about either of us. However, that can't be helped."

He paused, and did not seem able to go on.

"I hate speaking of things of this sort," he continued, after a moment, and in an impatient tone; "one's words sound like words in a valentine or a trashy novel. Well, it can't be helped. I love this girl, Mary Crawcour. I would do any thing for her."

"And yet you could speak yesterday about her marrying that man Sneyd."

"You were not then in my confidence. To the world I must seem to favor that marriage. I am pledged to do so."

"Pledged! To whom?"

"To the duchess."

"My dear Fortescue, how, in Heaven's name, could you enter into so rash an engagement?"

"How? How could I do otherwise, you mean? You know my position. I have two hundred a year and my pay. Can I marry that girl, accustomed to the life she is accustomed to, on that? Have I a right to fetter her with a long engagement, on the remote possibility of my becoming possessed of property between which and myself there are half a dozen lives? Have I a right to stand in the way of such a marriage as that with Sneyd. What could I say when the duchess put these questions to me?"

"Do you believe that Miss Crawcour would be happy in such a marriage?"

"I don't know," answered Fortescue, almost desperately. "I have seen such misery come from poverty in married life."

"Depend on it," I answered, "it is not the worst evil by many, many degrees. Fortescue," I continued, after a moment's pause, "does Miss Crawcour love you?"

"I think so," he said, speaking in a low voice.

"Then depend on it you are doing wrong. You are acting as you think rightly, and with a great and noble self-denial. But you are mistaken, cruelly, terribly mistaken, if you have pledged yourself to favor this match with Sneyd, and to give up your own hold on that young lady's love."

"I am pledged," Fortescue answered.

"To what?"

"To do nothing that is calculated to hinder the marriage with Sneyd, and not to press my own suit by word or deed for a period of five years—by which time, of course, all chance will be over."

"And this was what you were telling Miss Crawcour just now?"

"Something of it. She followed me to the billiard-room. She seems desperate, reckless. She swears she will not have him. I entreated her to leave me—you saw the rest."

I said, after a moment's pause, "The conduct of the duchess surprises me in this thing, I own. She has such good points, I know. She is kind-hearted, hospitable—"

"Yes, she is all that," said Fortescue, interrupting me, "but she is touched by the world like every body else. Why, you don't know what the notions of these people are. The things that are necessaries of life to them—real necessaries of life—require a fortune to provide them. To a woman like the duchess the existence which such means as mine imply seems what the work-house or absolute starvation appears to you. When the duchess puts the case so to me, I tell you, I am speechless."

"Fortescue," I said, after a long silence, "these things being so, and this most rash and miserable pledge being given, what do you do here?"

"I go to-morrow."

"Have you told Miss Crawcour that?"

"No, I have told no one. I mean to tell no one. When the party goes out riding to-morrow morning I shall excuse myself, and—and leave this place, most likely forever. There is a row in India, I hear; perhaps I shall get rid of my life there. It's at any body's service."

Again there was a pause. I knew what that careless tone meant, and for a time I could not speak.

"Fortescue," I said at last, "I have one more thing to ask. Has Sneyd spoken yet?"

"No," answered my friend, rising to lead the way to the house; "but he is certain to do so today—or to-morrow."

III.

That afternoon a party, of which Fortescue and I formed two, went out cover-shooting in the neighborhood. I never saw my friend shoot so ill. Indeed the poor fellow seemed entirely bewildered, and unfit for any thing. I think he only joined the party to get away from the house.

Miss Crawcour did not appear at dinner. She was suffering from a headache, the duchess said, and preferred remaining in her room. Lord Sneyd professed as much interest as would comport with his languid manner. I could see in Fortescue's face, carefully as he had drilled it, how much he suffered additionally at not spending this, his last evening, in Miss Crawcour's society.

The next day came, and I was again prevented, by certain literary labors to which I was obliged to devote myself, from going out in the early part of the day. I spent the morning in my room, which was situated in one of the round towers which flanked the entrance of the castle, one on each side.

About half past eleven I heard the voices of some of the men who were staying in the castle, as they lounged about the door, gossiping and talking. Soon after I heard the clatter of horses' hoofs in the distance, and soon the same sound accompanied by the scattering of gravel, and the "Wo, mare!" and "Steady horse!" of the grooms.

I looked out from behind my curtains; I am always very easily diverted from my work. The riding party was all assembled. Three or four men—among them, for a wonder, Lord Sneyd. He had his own horse, a nasty long-tailed white brute, that cost, I dare say, a mint of money, and that no man worth two-pence would get across. The duchess and Miss Crawcour were the ladies of the party. The duke came to the door to see them off. He was not going with them, having all sorts of things to arrange with that important minister the gamekeeper.

"Where's Fortescue?" said some one.

"Oh, he's not going this morning," the duke answered. "He is writing letters." He was helping Miss Crawcour into the saddle as he spoke. It may have been the exertion of mounting, or it may not, but I could see that she blushed deeply.

I did not like the look of the animal on which Miss Crawcour was mounted. As far as beauty went, certainly there was nothing to complain of. A handsomer mare I never saw. But the movements of the ears were too incessant and violent, and there was more white to the eye shown than I like to see in connection with a riding-habit. The mare had been difficult to hold while Miss Crawcour was being lifted on, and now that the young lady was fairly on the brute's back it became exceedingly restive, almost unmanageable.

"Are you afraid of her at all, Mary?" the duke asked, as he stood at the door; "she seems unusually frisky this morning."

"No, not in the least. She's always like this at starting."

This was Miss Crawcour's answer, but I thought she looked pale. Perhaps it was the reaction after that blush I had noticed. The duke spoke again. This time to the head-groom.

"Has that mare been exercised this morning, Roberts?"

The man hesitated just half a moment, and looked at the mare.

"Yes, your grace," he said, touching his hat.

"You're sure, Mary," the duchess said, "that you're not afraid? Do let them take her back and bring you another mount."

"Yes, yes, much better," added the duke. "Roberts, send that mare back, and saddle Robin Hood for Miss Crawcour."

"Beg your pardon, your grace, but the horse is in physic: he's not been very well for a day or two."

"Well, then, the brown mare, or Bullfinch, or—"

"No, no, no, no!" Miss Crawcour called from the saddle. "I like this mare best of all. Let her go," she said to the groom who was holding the cursed brute's head. And off she cantered, the mare plunging and kicking.

"Really," said Lord Sneyd, with his foot in the stirrup, "Miss Crawcour ought not to be allowed to ride that ferocious animal. Can nobody stop her?"

"You ride after her, Sneyd," said the duke, smiling, "and try if you can't bring her back." Lord Sneyd was in the saddle by this time, and cantered off at a regular rocking-horse pace. His groom behind him on a thorough-bred.

That was the last I saw of the cavalcade. The duke retired immediately to the gun-room, and I went back to my writing-table, but I could not help feeling a certain sense of uneasiness, the look of that mare not being at all to my liking, and the manner of the groom having left an impression on my mind that the animal had not really been out before that morning.

All the events of that day are very fresh in my memory. The next room to mine was a boudoir. There was a piano in it, and some one of the ladies of the party was playing on it. I don't know what she was playing, though I should recognize the air now in a moment if I heard it. It was what is called a "piece," and had a wonderful plaintive beauty about it. As the performer played it many times over, I suppose she was learning it.

I went on writing, and what I wrote seemed in a sort of way to be mixed up with this tune. Presently I heard the sound of wheels, and some light vehicle drove up to the door. I went again to the window. It was a dog-cart, driven by one of the duke's grooms, and it drove up before the door. Some servants brought out a portmanteau, some gun-cases, and other luggage, and placed them in the vehicle. Almost at the same moment my door opened, and Fortescue entered the room. I never saw any thing more dreadful than the suppressed agony in his face.

"Good-by, old fellow," he said, with a miserable ghastly smile. "I'm off, you see. Will you take charge of this note for the duchess? I've explained to Greta that I find my letters this morning require my presence in London. Good-by! I've only just time to catch the train."

"Stay," I said; "where can I write to you?"

"London, to-morrow. After that, Chatham. Good-by again, dear old fellow, good-by!"

He was gone. In a minute more I saw the duke come with him to the door, and after shaking him warmly by the hand and pressing him to return whenever he possibly could, they parted, and the dog-cart disappeared rapidly, behind that angle of the castle round which I had seen Miss Crawcour pass so short a time before.

Poor fellow! what a departure. What an episode in the gay story of the life at Creel.

I went back to my desk. And still from the next room came that same plaintive air, and still it seemed to belong to what I wrote, and to be an inseparable part of the day and its events.

Once more I was disturbed, and by the clatter of hoofs. It was a single horse this time, and going evidently at a tremendous pace. I looked out and saw young Balham, who had been one of the party of equestrians, dashing along the road at full gallop. He turned off in the direction of the stables, and I saw no more of him. I remained where I was, but with a dim foreboding that something had gone wrong, and by-and-by a low open carriage, empty, was driven out of the stable-yard at a great pace. Lord Balham rode rapidly on in front of it, both he and the carriage going back by the way he had come.

I still kept where I was, and in a few moments the door of the house was opened, and some of the servants came out. They looked out in the direction by which the carriage had disappeared. One or two ladies'-maids stood on the steps, one of them the duchess's, and there was another who was crying, but quite quietly, the servants in such houses being drilled into the greatest undemonstrativeness. I heard one of the men-servants say to another, "Roberts is gone off to Inverkeed for Dr. MacIntyre, and James has gone into Creel for Mr. Cameron. They'll both be here quickly." "Is his grace in the house?" "No. He's up at the plantations. But he's been sent for."

The conversation among the men stopped suddenly. The carriage, driving now very slowly, had come in sight. It was followed by some horsemen. Presently I made out that two grooms behind were leading each a lady's horse; then I saw that the duchess was sitting in the carriage bending over and supporting something—somebody—lying at length on the cushions. A gentleman, one of those on horseback, detached himself from the group, and rode swiftly up to the door.

"Is Miss Crawcour's maid here?" he asked.

The girl came forward, sobbing. The duchess's woman, older, with more head, more self-controlled, and more useful now, came out too.

Not a word more was spoken. The carriage drew up to the door, and I saw at a glance that it was Miss Crawcour over whom the duchess was bending; that the poor girl's habit was all torn and dirty; and that a handkerchief, deeply stained, was laid over her face.

There was no word spoken still. The duchess, in tears, descended from the carriage and went into the house to see that all was ready, while the gentlemen of the party lifted the poor maimed form of Miss Crawcour from the cushions. I noticed that Lord Sneyd did not assist in this, but hovered about the group in a helpless way. Nobody seemed to want him, or to notice him.

I remained still where I was. I knew I could be of no use, should only be in the way below. I could not help looking. I wish I had not. As they lifted Miss Crawcour from the carriage, the handkerchief that was over her face became displaced, and I saw—

One whole side of her face seemed to have been crushed and beaten in. That beautiful face!

It was covered again, in a moment, but I had seen it—and so had some one else. When Lord Sneyd looked upon that mutilated face he turned even paler than he had been before, and went into the house.

The door closed over the sad group, with Mary Crawcour's helpless figure carried in the midst of it, the carriage drove away to the stables, and all was quiet again.

"And he did it, think of that," said Balham. "It was that disgusting white brute of his to whom this terrible mishap is owing."

"What do you mean?" I asked, as we were talking some time afterward about what has been partly described above. "How did the thing happen? You saw it all."

"It is told in two words," said Balham. "You know that mare that poor Miss Crawcour used to ride. Well, she was always an unsafe, ill-conditioned mare, in my opinion, but on this occasion she was particularly bad. All the time we were out she was fidgeting and starting at every thing, and more than one of us wanted Miss Crawcour to let the groom put her saddle on one of the other horses, and let some man with a stronger hand ride the mare. However, it was no use, and so at last—I never saw a worse thing—the mare took fright at some barrow, or something by the side of the hedge, and bolted straight across the road at a bound. Miss Crawcour was thrown, but fell clean, luckily without becoming entangled with the stirrup, and might have escaped serious mischief, when up comes that intolerable ass Sneyd, on his infernal ambling Astley's-looking beast, and rides clean over her, the brute of a horse—ssh—I can't bear to think of it—sending one of his hoofs straight into her face as he passed."

"And her arm is broken too, is it not?"

"Yes, I believe so. That may, however, have happened when she fell; but the other thing—that fearful mutilation of the poor young lady's face—was done by a kick from that horse of Sneyd's, and by nothing else in the world. I saw it with my own eyes."

THE REST OF THIS MANUSCRIPT HE HAD PUT IN TO HIS WRITING-DESK.

SOME years after these things had happened I stood on the summit of one of those mighty mountains which form a boundary line, such as few countries can boast of, between Switzerland and Italy.

It was evening, and I was gazing with all my eyes into that strange receptacle for the dead which the monks of St. Bernard have placed at the door of their convent, and where the bodies of those unfortunates who have perished in the snow are preserved. They are embalmed by the highly rarefied air of that height, and do not decay. The Egyptian mummies are not more perfectly kept.

I was so absorbed in these strange figures that I scarcely noticed there was any one standing beside me, until I suddenly heard my own name pronounced by a voice familiar to me. I turned and found myself face to face with Jack Fortescue.

"Well," he said, almost before we had exchanged greetings, "this is the most extraordinary thing, the most marvelous combination of coincidences that ever took place since the creation of the world! Who do you think is in there?" pointing to the convent.

"Who?" I asked. "In Heaven's name, who?"

"In the strangers' parlor there, you will find, at this moment, your old acquaintance Lord Sneyd—and, what is more, a new acquaintance, if you choose to make it, in the shape of that nobleman's illustrious consort."

"What, the Irish-Italian singer, who, as I saw by Galignani, had managed to become Lady Sneyd?"

"The same."

"And your wife—where is she?"

"Mary is with me. Is it not extraordinary, incredible almost, that we should all be under the same roof again? Do you remember the last time?"

"Remember it? Shall I ever forget it?"

"Of course," Fortescue went on, "I can't let her come in contact with those people, so she keeps her room, or rather her cell. It is awfully cold, but any thing is better than such a meeting."

"But you will let me see her?"

"You? Why, of course," Fortescue answered. "How can you ask?"

"I will ask something else, then," I continued. "I will ask you to tell me some of the particulars of what took place after I left Creel and went abroad. My letters from England and the papers told me, to my great delight, of your marriage with Miss Crawcour, and also of Lord Sneyd's wonderful match. But I want to know more than these bare facts."

"There is really not much to tell," said Fortescue. "When I got your letter telling me of that terrible disaster at Creel I was at Chatham, and was, in fact, just negotiating for an exchange into a regiment that was going abroad at once. Your letter altered all my plans. Do what I would the thought of that poor maimed figure haunted me; the love which I received when she was at the full pride and glory of her beauty became, now that pity was mixed up with it, more than this fearful trouble had come upon her, a thing that I could no longer hold out against. I felt that I must go back to Creed. And I went.

"When I got there I found that that infernal brute and scoundrel, Saycd, had left the place. Very soon after the accident—you know that he had never actually spoken to the duke about Mary, or said any thing definite to her—well, very soon after the accident he discovered that it was not only necessary that he should pay a visit to some estate of his in Ireland. He left Creed, and has come back there no more. He went first of all to Ireland, and then he was attacked by rheumatism in a considerable length of time. There was an end of him. At least he became entangled in the big snares of a regular designing adventuress, and out of those snares he has never escaped. That was his joy.

"Well, I staid on and on at Creed. It was a quiet, delightful time. After the accident every body left—but Greta—he and I, you know, were always great friends—the duke pressed me to say that he might have somebody to shoot with, and I staid on and on.

"At that time, too, I saw more of the duchess than I had ever seen before, and on one day we began talking about the accident and about Sayd's behavior, and we ventured to say that, though that it Mary had broken every bone in her skin she would still regard him as the most unworthy herself on being thereby delivered from a marriage with the wretched creature that he had chosen for himself to be. The duchess did not differ from me, and somehow from that day a strange kind of hope and happiness began to take possession of me—a curious indefinite delight such as I had never felt before.

"At length a day came when I was allowed to see her. And when I went into the room and the footpoint Fortescue's voice faltered a little—"when I saw her sitting on a sofa, with her back to the sweet face covered with bandages, I knelt down by the side of the sofa and, in short, I made love to her myself. The duchess was present, but she was fairly beat, sister. Well, very soon I was discussing ways and means with the duchess.

"There never was any thing like that man's kindness. Besides making Mary a most generous present indeed, which he declared he had always intended to do, he set himself to work to see that such an appointment as should make it possible for me to marry. Between him and the duchess (whose interest is not small) this has been effected, so I wished, I've got my company—and here Fortescue now, if you please—and then sold my commission, and with my own small means I took my place in the Shot and Shell Department, my marriage to get on in a very inexplicable but delightful way.

"And the privations which were to make your wife so wretched?" I asked, a.l, almost fiercely, by the band.

"Looked much worse at a distance than they do close," said my friend. "I do think, sincerely, be continued, "that an important marriage ought to be made every now and then, if it is only to bring out the immense amount of real goodness that there is in the world. I am perfectly sure that if two such good people, however poor they may be, will only put a good face on it, and not go about sinking down in gloomy despair on the one hand, nor sinking down on the other in a blaze of pride—the other—I am perfectly sure, I say, that there is so much real goodness in the world that they will never know that they are poorer than other people, or suffer any of those humiliations of which we hear which has kept many true and loving hearts asunder. But come," said Fortescue, "I'm getting poetical. Let us go inside, and see how Lord and Lady Sweet are getting on. He'll be in a condition of either of us, you'll see."

Fortescue left me for a time to go and see after his wife, and I went up into the strangers' room. There was a good large company assembled, waiting for the supper hour, English tourists, foreign residents, and some French officers—among them, sure enough, sitting next to a very showy and overdressed lady with jewelry all over her, with a very strong amount of paint upon her cheeks, and with a long curl brought over her left shoulder—there was Lord Sweet.

A changed man already. Feeble and effeminate he was still, but he had ceased to be the sickly languid pett-maitre and coxcomb he was when I had last seen him. His air was lowered in tone. He had evidently seemed to be exercising much attention on his better-half, off whom he never took his eyes.

"I hear," said Fortescue to me, as he took his place by my side (as he supposed), "that he is intensely jealous of her, and leads, in consequence, the most miserable life imaginable. Look how she is watching, now that that French officer is speaking to her. The man is only offering her civilities, but Sweet looks as if he would like—if he had courage enough—to put his knife into him."

It was true. A more pitiable and contemptible sight I never witnessed than this man afforded me. It extended itself to the French officers opposite, to the young English undergraduate who sat next to me, and, even to the good-natured, fussy old monk who—a perfect man of the world, and a very agreeable fellow—took the head of the table at dinner.

I must say that Lady Sweet's appearance was not calculated to soothe her lord and master's suspicion. A more liberal use of a pair of fine rolling black eyes I never saw made. Not content with per this worthy pair retired, not the slightest attempt at reserve, she kept them constantly at work being made on the part of this distinguished nobleman. Perhaps he was of opinion that such attentions would be dangerous with his amiable consort. Perhaps he felt a little ashamed of himself.

As soon as those two were gone, at a point after a reasonable interval, Fortescue addressed himself to the young gentleman who played the part of host, and remarked that he would go up stairs, and, if his wife were not too much exhausted to receive them, would persuade her to come down and get thoroughly refreshed at the tea before retiring to her room.

Our host, with that interest in other people's affairs which foreigners either feel to a much greater extent, or assume so admirably, expressed his earnest hope that "Madame would be able to descend," and Fortescue left the apartment.

I own that at this moment I felt somewhat nervous.

In a short time the door opened, and Fortescue appeared with his wife on his arm. She was pale, as to me at once, and we shook hands cordially, while I spoke such words of congratulation as I had ready, which were, in truth, not very many. At one glance I saw that at all events the expression of her face was safe. A great matter that, at any rate.

The injury which she had sustained being from a kick, and not from a fall or dragging along on the ground, was confined entirely to one portion (the left side) of her face. That that injury had been a terrible one it was impossible not to see at a glance. The brow immediately over the eye was scarred, and the eyebrow something interrupted in its even sweep; the cheek was scarred and indented, and there was a slight scar on the nostril, all on this same side. But, as I have mentioned in a manner what sunken recess, had escaped; the mouth was untouched, and, above all, there was left entirely the general look, of which the attractiveness had been so great, that the actual injury which I had looked down on from the turret-window at Creed had left her still a beautiful woman. Her eyes, even, were have hoped.

We talked, presently, all three together—the rest of the company having retired, and our host and Lord Sweet, I think, having gone to their cafés, of the places to which they were bound and from which I was returning, and of a hundred other things, until the hour arrived at which it was time to part for the night.

"Good-night my dear," said Sweet—my friend and his wife standing by together—I thought I had never seen a more charming picture of happiness. Suddenly a thought seemed to strike her. She touched her husband's arm, and looked up to him.

"Would you have known me?" she asked, rather nervously.

"No one can tell," said Fortescue, interrupting my ready answer, "how I shall treat precious sort—she leaned down and touched it with her lips. "But for that we might not be together now. But, my dearest, I am very happy, and have no fear of misery unutterable, and mine—if not sanctified by suffering—at least purified. I can never look blank as that of any one of those unknown men to who have entered into the room to-night."

LES MISERABLES.

Extract of Letter from VICTOR HUGO to MR. WRAXALL.

"From the moment when M. Lesgiles is your friend, as he is mine, you can not fail to produce an excellent work, having for guide and counselor that great and noble mind. (Signed) VICTOR HUGO."

John Forster, the ablest critic in England—the Literary Editor of the London Examiner—in speaking of the AUTHORIZED TRANSLATION, by WRAXALL and LESGILES, says:

"On the publication of this celebrated Novel, in its original form, we entered very minutely into the story. It only now remains for us to say that WE CAN CONSCIENTIOUSLY RECOMMEND IT TO THE READING PUBLIC as a perfectly FAITHFUL VERSION—retaining, as nearly as the characteristic difference between the languages admits of, all the spirit and point of the original. IN ITS PRESENT FORM, 'Les Miserables' stands a very fair chance of having as wide a sale as the French edition."

The Authorized Edition,

Complete in One Volume, with Portraits and Biographical Sketch, is published for ONE DOLLAR, in Paper; or, ONE DOLLAR AND A HALF, in Muslin. NOW READY, and all orders filled from this day without delay.

Lyon's Kathairon.

This delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is again put up by the original proprietor, and is now made with the same care, skill, and attention, which has created so large a demand for it during a period of over one million bottles annually. It is sold at 75 cents in large bottles, and as these bottles can easily be sent in a year's time it is again in use that the Kathairon will be the most delightful hair dressing in the world, but that it cleanses the scalp of scurf and dandruff, gives new hair a lively, rich luxuriant growth, and prevents it from turning gray. These are considerations worth knowing. The Kathairon has been tested for over twelve years, and is warranted as described. Any lady who wishes a beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon. It is finely perfumed, clear and colorless. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.

THE REVERSE AT FREDERICKSBURG.

We have again to report a disastrous reverse to our arms. Defeated with great slaughter in the battle of 13th, General Burnside has now withdrawn the army of the Potomac to the south side of the Rappahannock, where the people congratulate themselves that it is at least in safety. And now, who is responsible for this terrible repulse?

General Burnside was appointed to the command of the army of the Potomac on 9th November, and began at once to prepare to advance before the end of March of his army toward Fredericksburg. In view of such a movement General McClellan had, before his removal, suggested the propriety of rebuilding and occupying the railroad from Aquia Creek to Falmouth; but, for some reason not apparent, the War Department had not acted upon the suggestion. About 12th November General Burnside notified the Department that he would arrive at Fredericksburg in about a week, and that pontoons must be there by that time, in order to enable him to cross and occupy the city on the south side of the river. On the 21st General Sumner arrived at Fredericksburg, and found that there was not a pontoon present, and the railroad between Aquia Creek and Falmouth being out of order, there was no means of getting, nay, not a sufficient supply of forage. It was absolutely impossible to cross the river, and the enemy were already arriving on the south side and occupying its earth-works.

General Burnside, on discovering this state of things, rejoiced instantly to Washington to ascertain why he was being sacrificed. No satisfaction he obtained nor deserved. But a general officer, one of the most distinguished in the service, not in the army of the Potomac, as early as 23d November, made to me known his opinion that the movement via Fredericksburg "was a failure," because Burnside had been unable to occupy the south bank of the Rappahannock in time.

In the course of two weeks pontoons were furnished to the army, the railroad was repaired, and supplies were forthcoming. But, on the other hand, Lee, with 150,000 men, was strongly intrenched on the opposite side of the river. The two ranges of hills which command the slope at the foot of which the Rappahannock runs and Fredericksburg lies. The question was, What was to be done? A council of war was held on the night of 11th. At that council it is understood that Generals Sumner, Franklin, Hooker, and all the corps commanders who had been invited were decidedly opposed to a movement across the river and up the slope. It is remored that Burnside then said that he was ordered to cross the river and attack the batteries in front, and that he would do it, so matter what the cost. This of course closed the discussion, and the Generals made their preparations accordingly. On 12th the army began to crossed without serious resistance. On 13th the rebel batteries were attacked in front by the bulk of Burnside's army, and our troops were engaged with a loss which is now variously estimated at from twelve to seventeen thousand men. The rebel loss is not known, but they must have lost many score of men. On the night of 15-16th, General Burnside withdrew his army to the north side of the river.

We are indulging in no hyperbole when we say that these events are rapidly filling the heart of the loyal North with sickness, disgust, and despair. Party lines are becoming effaced by such unequivocal evidences of administrative imbecility; it is the men who have given and trusted the most, who now feel most keenly that the Government is unfit for its office, and that the most gallant efforts ever made by a really tried people are being neutralized by the obstinacy and incapacity of their leaders. Where this will all end no one can say. But it must end soon. The people have shown a patience, during the past year, quite unexampled in history. They have borne, silently and grimly, imbecility, treachery, failure, privation, loss of friends and means, almost every suffering which can afflict a brave people. But they can not be expected to suffer that such massacres as this at Fredericksburg shall be repeated. Matters are rapidly ripening for a military dictatorship.

THE BRITISH PIRATES "ORETO" AND "ALABAMA."

The publication of the official correspondence between the State Department and our foreign ministers at length places us in possession of the facts regarding the construction and outfit of the famous pirates Oreto and Alabama. Public report long ago classed these pirates as British. But many persons, unwilling to believe that a friendly nation would wantonly take advantage of a civil war in this country to engage in the business of piracy, have regarded the designation as unjustified and injurious. The facts now leave no further room for doubt.

On February 18, 1862, Mr. Adams, United States Minister to England, laid the case of the Oreto before the British Government. She was then building at Liverpool, for the parties who had already dispatched the Hornet to the Southern States, and the whole tenor of these destination and her character was submitted to Earl Russell. The latter referred the case to the British Commissioners of Customs, at Liverpool, under date of February 22, that their collector had "every reason to believe she was for the Italian Government," and stated that while she was pierced for guns, she had none on board, and the opinion appeared to be that "she was not going to receive any in England." The answer was perfectly satisfactory to Earl Russell, who sent it to Mr. Adams; though every body in Liverpool knew perfectly well that she was a Confederate steamer.

On 22d March the Oreto moved out into the Mersey, and was handed over by her builders to Captain Bullock, "of the United States Navy," Lieutenants Maffitt, Young, etc., who had come from the South to command her in the steamer Annie Childs, which had run the blockade. On meeting on the river the Annie Childs dipped her colors (the "Stars and Bars") to the Oreto, and the officers of the former vessel were ordered at once to repair to the evening on board the Oreto. A flat-boat was simultaneously sent alongside the Oreto with her armament. These facts, which were quite notorious in Liverpool, were communicated by the United States Consul to Mr. Adams, and by him to Earl Russell. On 7th May, Mr. Adams referred to the Commissioners of Customs, who reported, on April 6, that the Oreto sailed on 22d March "under the Danish flag for Palermo, where she was forwarded to London; that there was no reason for supposing she was not going to Palermo, for which port she cleared with ballast and 178 tons of arms on board. As a vessel clearing for Palermo would not require 178 tons of arms, and as every body knew that she was going out to Sicily but to Nassau, one is surprised to find that the British Commissioners of Customs, who sent in this report, should not be fully aware of the arms likewise. The Oreto fairly at sea, Earl Russell gave "a polite expression of his regret" to Mr. Adams that the Oreto "left Liverpool before the British colony of Nassau, where the famous pirate, Captain Semmes, and the Sumter, are now at Cardenas, was waiting to take command of her. A force was performed there by the British officials, highly to the discredit of the character of the little place—Nassau: the Oreto was seized by the authorities, and formally released on 8th June. She forthwith completed her armament and coaled up; whereupon, our gun-boats being excluded from Nassau by the order of the Governor forbidding them to follow, and out of coal on board in that harbor, she sailed at the right time, and, through the negligence of Commander Preble, succeeded, under British flag, in getting fairly into the harbor of Mobile.

Here is one pirate, built in a British port, manned by British seamen, sent to sea under British colors, and finally under the flagrance of the clearest evidence of her character, received and protected in a British colonial port, even while British guns, on board the vessels, a rebel port under cover of the British flag. It it is unfair to call the Oreto a British pirate it would be difficult to describe a vessel which should deserve that designation.

Let us turn to the Alabama, or "290." She was built in the autumn of 1862, in the yard of the ship-yard of Messrs. Laird & Co., at Birkenhead, opposite Liverpool, England. On 23d June last Mr. Adams requested the British Government with the facts. Earl Russell referred the matter to the Commissioners of Customs; and they, under date of July 23, reported that, though she was evidently built for a man-of-war in the service of "some foreign government," and was being prepared with guns, shot, shells, and warlike stores, there was "no good ground for detaining or interfering with" her. Every one in Liverpool, including the Commissioners and Earl Russell himself, knew perfectly well for what "government" she was being built. Yet the British Government, in accordance with the view that there was "no ground for interference," and asked for fresh evidence. This was furnished within a few days. But Russell objected to its "legal form," and it was sent back to the Consul to be properly authenticated. Meanwhile the "290" was hurried forward as rapidly as possible. On 16th July Mr. Adams, fearing fresh quibbles, took legal advice. Mr. Collyer, Queen's Counsel, one of the highest legal authorities in England, gave a written opinion that the vessel was being fitted out as a rebel privateer was not good; and the subject of the British Neutrality Act. On 23d July this opinion, together with depositions, showing the destination of the vessel, were laid before Earl Russell. On 23d Mr. Collyer, who was again consulted, replied: "It appears difficult to make out a case under the present Foreign Enlistment act, which, if not enforced on this occasion, is little better than a dead letter." This opinion was likewise forthwith transmitted to Earl Russell. Nothing, however, was done; the excuse which was afterward given by Earl Russell being, that the Queen's Advocate, Sir John D. Harding, was ill. Under the pressure of Mr. Adams's efforts, other counsel was taken, and their opinion was obtained on the morning of 29th July. It was forthwith sent into the Circumlocution Office to be copied, and orders, through the same channel, were dispatched to Liverpool to detain the vessel. We need hardly say that the tenor of these opinions and orders were known at Liverpool long before the official documents arrived, and that the "290," or Alabama, sailed to sea on the same day—29th July—receiving her armament off Point Lynas. She made for the Azores, where she met a "tender" with a second lading with coal, stores, and at once commenced the career of devastation which has made her infamous.

Here is a vessel built in a British dock-yard, by a member of the British Parliament—Mr. Laird; armed with British guns, manned with British seamen, fitted out under the auspices of British officials, in defiance alike of the remonstrances of our Minister and of the Foreign Enlistment Act, putting to sea under British protection, and commencing at once her career by the destruction of ten helpless and defenseless merchantmen. If this craft is not a British pirate, what would constitute one?

There are many things in this affair which we deeply regret. The Secretary is altogether too sanguine and too wordy. He is always indulging in predictions which remain unfulfilled, and writing a page when a sentence would answer the purpose better. But the criticism which he provokes soon gives way, on a perusal of these State-Papers, to a much stronger emotion, which is aroused by the uniform tenor of the dispatches of the British Government. There is not a single dispatch from Earl Russell which does not breathe covert hostility to the United States, and an obvious though unexpressed desire for their permanent division. The ruin of this country has evidently been the one object nearest the heart of the British Government. It was to secure that end that pirates were fitted out with impunity, in defiance of the laws of England, in British ports; that the legitimate exercise of undoubted war blockading operations was jealously denounced; that the highly proper restrictions laid upon contraband trade between a New York and Canada were made the subject of a formal remonstrance; that every possible opportunity of harassing and menacing us was eagerly grasped at. Mason's correspondence from Paris shows that the Emperor has all along been friendly to us, and would probably have recognized the Southern Confederacy long before, but for the fear that the Queen was generally popular, but the suspicions of the British press, supported as they are by the official and unofficial expressions of members of the British Government, gradually created a sentiment hostile to us and our cause. Had not England there would have been no rebel privateers, no rebel armies, merchant vessels would have been burned, and public sentiment throughout Europe would have remained—as it was at first—on the side of law, order, established government, and freedom.

England has been sowing, during this past year, a harvest which will some day be reaped at a frightful cost.

OBITUARY.

Ralph, before Fredericksburg, on December 15, Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph W. Vance, of the Fourth Rhode Island Volunteers. The Providence Journal thus recounts his death:

"He was the 2nd of six regiment, each brother leading it on. The fatal shot would have struck down no other than the promising young officer. Though he had attained to so conspicuous a position, and by regular promotion fairly earned his high and hallited rank, he was yet only twenty-six years of age. He was the son of the late George Curtis, Esq., formerly of the Continental Bank of New York, and formerly of this city, and was the grandson of Judge Curtis, of Providence, the first Judge of this city. He was educated at the Lawrence Scientific School, Cambridge, and was a graduate of that institution. When the war broke out he held a place in the Engineer Corps of the Croton Water Work. He promptly tendered his services to his country."

THE LOUNGER.

WHERE WE ARE.

In the constant criticism upon the delays and blunders of the war we ought, in justice to ourselves, to reflect that the management of every great European struggle, and that the comparison between ourselves and the methods of despotic governments is eminently unfair. In every great war hitherto, since the organization of standing armies, the army has been the controlling element; and it has been the body-guard of the existing government—instituted, indeed, for that purpose. The army has been the support, and the subservility of the officers of what small force we had were either traitorous or doubtful. And from this cause arose the chief difficulties of our situation.

Any other great government in the world which should be forced into a rebellion, as ours has, by illintrenched in the regular tradition of the country, in all the complexity of governmental offices and relations, and most strongly in a large, well-fectly-armed, and well-disciplined army. This force would at once show a front infinitely more formidable than that of the enemy. At the first intimation it would strike heavily and everywhere. It would believe the worst, and lose no moment in parleying or hesitating. We have but to see how Austria, the ablest and most brutal of civilized governments, repressed Italy, a distant and utterly foreign country, for more than thirty-five years, and we can calculate the value of this permanent organized military force constantly animated by suspicion.

Now, to go no further, our Government had no military force that we mentioned. Before the union was fully resolved and rapidly organizing. When the explosion came there was but one solitary sentinel to depend on, and that was patriotism. But when this emotion cordially responded, as it did in many men as were asked, and would have doubled the army in a week, there was not the beginning. There were men, but they were not soldiers. There were no arms, no means of transportation, or equipment. Every thing must be made from the beginning. Contracts were invited, and the conveyance multiplied. A tremendous gale had struck the ship with every inch of canvas spread. There were no sailors, and the passengers were summoned to shorten sail. They might sing out most lustily, "Ay, ay, Sir." They might spring and run the rigging, and do every thing in a moment. But the chaos was that the ship and company would be swamped before they could learn how to do what they were most anxious to effect.

Take the first necessity—the military preparation. Here were thousands of willing men—some, drilled militia, but the mass utterly raw. They had not been paid in months. What should do it? To whom did common sense instinctively turn? Of course to the existing military head. Grant that the chief of them was too old. Grant that his superior military genius had never been proved. Yet he was the man to whom all men looked to effect. There might be a greater soldier among the people. The village Hampden, the unknown Cromwell, Julius Cæsar, Napoleon, might be only awaiting the summons. Shall we advertise for him? Shall we appoint a Board to find him, or a Marshal Turenne? Clearly we could only try what was at hand. As when there is a sudden necessity for a new pair of eyes the optician—we do the best we can.

We take this broad view only in illustration of all. It is easy enough now to say that the regular leader was too old; that he did not understand the war nor the country; that he was not what he was but, not only to frighten; that he was not in earnest; that he was slow, dim, incapable. Yet; but we can only say that we know it now, and we could learn it only by experience. We had to try and try and try in order to learn what the real course cost us most heavily. If, indeed, after proved incapacity, the incapable were retained, the offense was most inexcusable. But was not always the fact. But a thousand complications of otherwise perfectly simple courses will readily suggest themselves to any student of our political and military circumstances and character.

To say, then, that the rebellion might have been defeated in three months is to say that if the scope of the war had been appreciated; if the army had been fully organized; if the soldiers had been like Cæsar's; if the leaders had been eminent and skilful; and, consequently, the loyalty of the war had been an immediate, severe, and overwhelming invasion of the rebel section, and a war régime throughout the country, which the case manifestly would have sufficed. Yes; but why not begin by supposing that there had been no rebellion?

The question upon the first page of our last paper but one was itself a sign of the progress of events. Emancipation was not then in the knowledge. It was a portrait of Burnside surrounded by those of his Generals, Sumner, Hooker, Sigel, and Franklin. Twenty years have shown that these are earnest, hearty, able, fighting generals. The Message and the Proclamation are similar signs of another kind. The essential contest is expected. Emancipation is recommended in detail, and the immediate and unconditional emancipation of slaves in States still in rebellion is proclaimed for the 1st January.

There is no doubt that we have disbelieved, and delayed, and blundered. But much of all was inevitable, and the fact that the essential of the contest is in its nature radical. The war began with three parties in the country. It will end with two; that which holds a government must have power-ctone is Slavery, and that which builds on liberty.

TO MY COUSIN JOHN.

My dear John Bull,—You have one name, but there are really two persons under your hat. One is genuinely faithful, liberty-loving, and the other is a mean, exclusive, narrow, and jealous fellow, who has been trying for two decades to find England and England for him. It is this last whom you always allow to talk and act for you and other nations. He gives him place, money, titles, homage, and servility of every kind, and he permits you to have certain wages. The man whom he hates most heartily he allows you to take the part of all Englishmen against a few, and who is most cordially encouraged to exist by the consent of the mass of the governed.

It is this fellow, your alter ego, who hastened to declare that he holds in fact as his counterparts equal belligerents with the Government; who inspires most of your leading journals to write nonsense lies about us; who secretly sells arms and ammunition to the rebels; who fits out ships to run the blockade; who builds pirates to prey upon our commerce; who, with a hopeless ignorance of the facts and understanding of the principles involved in rebellion by our revolution, gravely asserting the right of secession, and lullily sneering at what he does not understand.

That the rebellion not only strikes at the very roots of all civil order and the possibility of permanent cent government; that its avowed object is to open the slave-trade and extend the area and conditions of human slavery—an object which would disgrace Dahomey or a Polynesian Prince—an object, also, which is totally repugnant to the spirit and the history of your own country, is all of no avail, against—what? Why, my dear John, against an organic hatred of our system and principle. Fye, look at it. The vindication of this Government by the supporters of the rebellion will be the proof of the superior force of a popular to any form of aristocratic Government. It is the justification of John Bright against all Tyrrhen of the News against the Times: of John Stuart Mill and Cairnes against Blackwood: of the people of England against the aristocracy. It is against the governing class can think of such a result with patience?

But more than that, our success leaves us with a vast and powerful fleet built in the light of the most advanced science. We command from the sea not only a conventional but a naval nation, and with a navy of iron. How do you like that old Wooden-Walls likes that? Still again, we emerge with a national hatred of the governing influence of Great Britain, but with a vast army and navy and with the habit of war. Not that only; but this warlike nation, hating England, emerges with the knowledge that it holds in its one hand all of England's cotton, and the other by its grain. Do you suppose that is an inspiring thought for that very democrat, who walks under your hat and calls himself by your name?

But look here, John Bull. Do not for a moment suppose that I confound the generous part of you with the mean. By no means. The generous, the most cultivated, the richest, the most intelligent, has not hesitated at investing and uttering the most unfounded calumnies about you. The ignorant, the sordid, cowardly, stupid, mad, ferocious, grasping, unjust. It has declared that I was destroying all commerce, slavery, and trying to make myself rich, cheap, chivalric, and deserving brother. But it has consoled itself by the thought that I was a monster, starvation, and at last utter anarchy and riot, would compel me to yield to destruction. It has asserted that by waging an inhuman war I kept the cotton from your looms and the bread from your mouth. But you have been told that those lies were the sufferer. You know that a wanton effort to destroy me is nothing by the growers of cotton, who hope they never will be in a position even to help them. They have not persuaded you, but they have found the heart of your alter ego already theirs.

And now, John, I want you to understand that I know this and honor you. You cease to be John for we are both children of the people. I am, to be sure, engaged in a hard fight, but I was never more prosperous. My debts during the war have grown as when for the world. My stock-shops are active. My cities and towns were never more busy. But men, who are the friends of your enemies here, try to annoy me. I have been forced to learn how to fight and to fight, and the old habit of the seaman you to suffer sorely. But here are ships full of food for you, and here are hundreds of full of privation and friendship. Remember in all time to come that the cause of an aristocracy can never be the cause of the people. I have learned that. It is the aristocracy which is now seeking my life. If it kill me, your chances are dim. If I conquer, you may look at me to see your future.

Your Cousin,

JONATHAN.

THE CONVALESCENTS

THERE is one subject of very great moment which should certainly be corrected; and that is the mingling of convalescent and discharged soldiers and deserters in the same quarters. There is a large hospital, a part of military settlement at Alexandria, where this is done; and the treatment of the convalescents in particular is such as is much more charitable consideration than it has yet secured. The Sanitary Commission is an invaluable aid; but its special function is with the really sick and suffering; and a separate bureau or department might well be instituted for this purpose. We hear of one hospital that has sent within a few months two hundred cases of delirium tremens. Liquor, tobacco, balls, and games of every kind for the amusement of the soldiers who are getting well. Of course any one can imagine the stuff the hilarious fellows are of the most earnest and persuasive kind. But in sending them away, I forgot the quiet which the sick people must play. They can't read tracts all the time. When they have read they must have exercise; and the old comfortable story of the Jew with "the Dairyman's Daughter," nor kick "The Midnight Sky" as high as the ceiling.

And let it be remembered that the longer the war lasts the more stringent is the demand for every kind of supply for the sick and wounded, and the Commission. The most skeptical now see and confess its great service to the life and health of the army; and its agencies, although in conformity to the military departments, are yet exact on independent lines. Its principles are to supply at Anteiem forty-eight hours before those of the regular Government authorities; and to travelling hospital and pharmacy of the commissariat moves in the van of the army. Meanwhile its faithful and devoted agents are not without flinch. The Sanitary Commission is an illustration of the results attainable by the direct application of common sense to the necessities of life. It is, of course, exactly what the Sanitary Department of the army ought to be. But it was not the department which outdoors could equally well organize and conduct. If every department had been managed with a similar regard to the practical requirement of its intention, why then—why then, things would have been different.

For the convalescents, also, reading of a pleasant, not profanely pious, kind is also most desirable. Magazines, light books, newspapers, are always welcome. The current illustrated newspapers are especially interesting to them. A shower of such as ours falling into the camp every week would be most refreshing and fertilizing. The veterans like to see the faces of their heroes, and the places where they have fought. But whatever you may choose to send bear them in mind, that here are those who are recovering from wounds and sickness, fallen to them in serving us with their health and lives.

FEELING THE PUBLIC PULSE.

WEBSTER DR. Barney and Mr. J. Wesley Green are men of straw or not the object of the reports about them is clear enough. They are put forth as feelers of the public pulse. The men who mean that the Government shall be destroyed by surrender to the rebellion; who, by spreading the stories that propositions of peace have been offered by the rebels, to ascertain whether the nation is yet ready to end the war with any thing less than actual victory.

The object of the reaction do not hesitate to throw off the thin veil of loyalty, and to declare that the war can not end in one way only; that is, by a convention and negotiation. They do not expect at all or as much to be deal with facts. How they can there be a convention or negotiation except by the virtual admission of the Government that it can not maintain its full authority? For if the Government is to be maintained by force simply there is clearly no need of a convention. If it is to be changed, then it is not maintained. Certain citizens have risen in arms against the Government, not because they have been oppressed, but because they think that they can do it, and because they do not like a Government which they can not control. Let any intelligent person to from the first provided that on the back of the letter to franked the words "Soldier's letter," and that it be "free" to write."

A man at Newcastle, who served four days on a jury in his as in full of how that it is hard work for him to lay down anything.

A person speaking to a very deaf man, and getting angry at his not catching his meaning, said, "Why, it is as plain as the nose on your face." "Is that my face, Sir," replied the person; "but I am D E F."

"How will he plays for one so young," said Mr. Partridge, looking at his son's opponent. "Why, he's just come to the door; "and how much his little brother looks like him to be sure."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Wednesday, December 10, in the Senate, a resolution directing the Military Committee to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of officers in the regular service of the army was carried. During the last session of Congress, when upon sick leave, was adopted. The Senate took up the amendment of the House to the Indian Bill, and postponed until to-day. Senator Henderson, of Missouri, introduced a bill to amend an act passed in relation to the State of Missouri in affecting the emancipation of the slaves in that State, which, on the 1st of January, 1863, providing for the admission of the State of Western Virginia into the Union, on the 4th day of March following. The resolution was adopted calling on the Secretary of War for information in relation to the number of persons who have been sent from their commands; the number of escapes and deaths; the number of persons who have been arrested by order of the Secretary of War, and the number of which commissions shall have been by dispensed with, etc. The Committee on Ways and Means were instructed to bring in a bill amending the eleventh section of the Excise and Tax law. Under the order upon adjournment the Senate met as directly that is possessed by the principal assessors.

On Thursday, December 11, in the Senate, a resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of allowing the pay of Major and Surgeon into the United States upon the payment of the same duties as are imposed upon like articles from beyond the Cape of Good Hope. The President sent in a Message recommending a vote of thanks to Major-General Grant, Major-General Lieutenant John L. Worden, the commanders respectively of the iron-clad steamers Monitor and Galena in Hampton Roads, a gallant conduct in the action with the rebel steamer Merrimac; rendered. The Secretary of the Navy was directed to furnish copies of certificates of the number of vessels taken up and employed in the aforesaid. —In the House, a resolution requesting the naval vessels to convey ships loaded with provisions for the starving operatives of England was introduced. The Senate bill to amend the Excise law was passed. The bill appropriating $2500 indemnity for damages occasioned by the Sioux Indians in Minnesota was passed by the United States steamer San Jacinto was passed. A resolution was adopted requesting the President to direct the Warden receive the thanks of Congress by resolution for the capture of the rebel steamer Alcester in command of the Monticello, such thanks being necessary under the law to be given by the President. In the House, on motion of the Navy, was referred to the Naval Committee. A resolution was adopted directing the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the expediency of establishing a uniform system of banking. It was resolved that a day should be assigned for the consideration of the Emancipation Proclamation, but the President's exemption was not granted by the Constitution; that the Senate, in connection, as positioned in the proclamation, is not calculated to hasten the restoration of the Union, but on the contrary to prolong the war, as an assumption of power dangerous to the rights of citizens, and of the proclamation of the government. On motion of Mr. Lovejoy the resolutions were laid on the table by a vote of 78 yeas to 64 nays. On Friday, December 12, the Senate went into Committee of the Whole, and discussed the Pension bill, but took no action.

On Friday, 13th, in the Senate, a resolution was offered by Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, declaring that the policy of allowing to citizens of the United States the right to purchase cotton raised in a county of one hundred dollars before the proclamation of the 1st of 1863, be stricken out, and that as was allowed to enlisted men by that act; and that the Secretary of the Interior be requested to report and speedy payment of the troops in the field and hospitals. The bill providing for the appraisal and Mississippi and Tennessee was not in session.

On Monday, 15th, in the Senate, Senator Davis, of Kentucky, offered a resolution, which was laid on the table, declaring that the Senate disapproved the resolution that an executive Committee should be appointed to inquire into the expediency of prevailing by act of Congress that any loyal citizen of the United States, who has sustained damage from the troops of the States engaged in the present rebellion, may set off such damages against any claim or demand against him in any action at law by any such rebellious States, or the agents or trustees of such States, or in any case where such claim or demand is for the use or benefit of such States. A resolution instructing the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire whether some method can not be devised to annihilate the sympathy which exists between the British Lancashire operatives and the rebels to be adopted. The resolution calling for information relative to arbitrary arrests was taken up, and after some discussion it was made a special order. It was argued that the President had no authority, under the Constitution, to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. —In the House, a resolution, declaring that in the judgment of the House there should be no extension changing the existing law in relation to the payment of interest on the public debt in coin, was adopted by a vote of 78 yeas to 64 nays. A joint resolution, on a resolution, that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be authorized to issue to the Secretary of State to pay in coin any portion of the bonded public debt maturing during the present year, pursuant to the first day of January, 1863, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. Wood introduced a bill to amend the act to raise for the public duty five dollars per ton per centum. It was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. Scott, of Missouri, introduced a bill, which was referred, to procure the abolishment of slavery in Missouri, and to provide compensation to loyal owners. A resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of levying a tax tariff, increasing the duty on foreign goods not of prime necessity, so that the importation of foreign goods shall not exceed the annual exports of domestic production and manufactures, exclusive of specie. A resolution declaring the President's emancipation proclamation was adopted by a vote of seventy-eight against fifty-one. Pensions and appropriation bill was reported and made the special order for Thursday. The first report of the Committee of Ways and Means, by Mr. Conkling, was offered a resolution in effect dissolving the Union, and declaring that the people of the Confederate States have the right to do so, and that they are forcing by their acts who voted in the negative. In the Senate, on Tuesday, December 16, Mr. Cox, of Ohio, delivered a speech on the letter of President's Message and the removal of General McClellan.

On Tuesday, 16th, in the Senate, the resolution announcing the thanks of Congress for his recent capturing the rebellion was laid on the table. The consideration of the resolution of the Senate was postponed until Saturday the next day. The death of Representative Luther Hamilton, of Worcester, Massachusetts, was announced, the customary resolutions of respect and condolence adopted, and the Senate adjourned. In the House, on motion of Mr. Colfax, of Ohio it was resolved that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House of the amount of the bonds, and the amount of the bonds issued in 1861, and extended by act of July 17, 1862, and the rate of interest which each bears, and also the name of the parties who are registered as the owners thereof, and each information as the Government may possess as to the real ownership thereof; and that he communicate to this House any and all correspondence which may have been addressed to him or to the Treasury Department, pro-posing to purchase at a special medium any of these the owners or holders of said loan, and whether he proposes to pay the same in coin, or in Government notes. Mr. Stevens's resolution declaring that the Union must be and remain one and indivisible forever, and that it would be a high crime to advise or accept peace propositions on any other terms, was passed by the following vote: Yeas 78. Public Academy appropriation bill was passed. A bill for the admission of the State of Indiana, with the Pan Handle, was referred to the Committee of Mr. Stanford, of Washington, and the House adjourned.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We publish on page 830 an account of the bombardment of Fredericksburg, and the unsuccessful crossing of the river. On the following day, Saturday, 13th, the fight was renewed. The rebels report that 40,000 men of their army engaged against a large force of the rebels. Franklin, on the left, attacked Jackson's corps, and drove it back in the centre, attacked the first line of the rebel defense, but was driven back. The loss of his was very heavy. On Sunday, 14th, the battle was renewed. There was some hard fighting in the centre, but no general engagement.

THE RETREAT.

During the storm and darkness of Monday night General Burnside succeeded in making good his retreat across the pontoon bridges without exciting the vigilance of the enemy. The artillery was first moved over, the infantry following in order, and reaching the camp on the hills in a short time after daylight. The pontoon bridges were then removed, and the communication between the two shores was effectually cut off.

AFFAIRS IN THE SOUTHWEST.

From Cairo we learn that General Grant's expedition on the Mississippi has returned to Helena, Arkansas. The rebels in that region are now hemmed in on all sides. Many killed, wounded, and captured, and our loss thirty-four killed and one hundred wounded. The force under General Sherman has returned to Memphis. The rebel army of Tennessee is said to be at Grand Junction and Corinth. General Grant is still at Oxford with his forces.

AFFAIRS IN LOUISIANA.

Twelve regiments left Newbern on 6th, probably to reinforce the forces at Kinston and Fayetteville. Two gunboats and five gun-boats accosted the Chowan River. The rebels have fortified themselves at and in motion from Suffolk, indicating a movement on Weldon.

RUNS OF THE "ALABAMA."

According to the news brought by the steamer Alice, which arrived at this port last week from Point Petre, Guadaloupe, the Alabama was then in the Caribbean, after robbing and destroying by fire the ships Lem Simmons, Parker Cook, Crown Point, Tonawanda, and the United States steamer Hatteras, which she captured off Galveston. The Hatteras was sunk in pursuit, and four her officers and crew, among eight hundred and fifty men of the French authorities, she made her escape. She is said to have recently returned to Martinique: the San Jacinto is watching her.

WHY MCLELLAN DIDN'T TAKE RICHMOND.

The Richmond papers have contained lately a full trial of General McDowell, and his testimony was of intense interest. It appears that the plans of the campaign were on the peninsula. Among other things he said: "I have no doubt that if I had gone with my corps to Fredericksburg the Potomac would have taken Richmond had not the corps of General McClellan been moved to it. It is the opinion that had the command of General McDowell joined that of General McClellan at Fredericksburg, that Hanover Court House from Fredericksburg, we would have been in Richmond a week after the junction."

AFFAIRS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS FROM CALIFORNIA.

The election for Members of Congress for the First and Second Districts of California took place on Wednesday, December 3. The choice of two unconditional Union men, Messrs. Sanders and Michael Hahn. Mr. John Ferguson, whom the New Orleans Delta calls "the negro-worshipping abolitionist candidate," was defeated, at which the Delta explains.

ELECTION IN TENNESSEE.

Governor Johnson has issued a proclamation providing for an election of representatives for the Ninth and Tenth Congressional districts of Tennessee. The vote is believed that a large majority of the voters in those districts are in favor of supporting the Government and the Constitution and laws; but no delegal person is to be permitted to vote.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF FREDERICKSBURG BY THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—[SEE PAGE 820.]

A Topographical Map of EASTERN VIRGINIA from Fredericksburg to Richmond, taken from tracings (now in the possession of the Government) of the original Railroad Surveys of this portion of the State, comprising the Topography for Six Miles on each side of the track. MY LITTLE PICTURE.

I have sent you a little picture
Of a face you used to know,
And I ask you to guard and keep it
For the sake of years ago.

As a token of Peace and Friendship,
I have sent it across the sea,
To ask if, as I have forgiven,
You too have forgiven me.

Not to call up the love that is gone,
Or to bring back the sad dead past;
Or the blossoms of hope that faded
In the biting wintry blast.

Not to recall the light grasp of hands
That told what lips could not speak;
Or the long last kiss that grew "Farewell,"
And branded it on the cheek.

Nor to tell of a weary, wasting pain,
The wish for a well-loved face,
The undue longing to fill once more
The heart's cold vacant place.

The sole o'er the love that passed away,
The cry of one's keen smart,
That echoed, unanswer'd and unheard,
Through the chambers of the heart.

But to tell of regrets forgotten,
Add bid thee pardon the past,
And take from the hand I offer
Peace and friendship at the last.

It will look at you gently and kindly,
And bid you be happy again,
And tell you to bury the wretched years
Of our passion and our pain.

It will tell that though life may be weary,
There are bright days for me still,
If we live with a true and honest heart,
And a firm and upright will.

And through the dim coming future,
As the good years roll along,
It will whisper some sweet words of comfort,
And sing you a cheering song.

It will ask you to look for reward,
To the land where spirits meet,
To the calm for the weary heartache,
And the rest for weary feet.

Then take care of my little picture,
And do not cast it away;
'Tis the first that you send to look at
And love in a by-gone day.

CHAPTER IV.

WHEN the servants' dinner-bell at St. Crux rang as usual on the day of George Bartram's departure, it was remarked that the new parlor-maid's place at table remained empty. One of the luftier servants was sent to her room to make inquiries, and returned with the information that "Louisa" felt a little faint, and begged that her attendance at table might be excused for that day. Upon this the superior authority of the housekeeper was invoked, and Mrs. Drake went up stairs immediately to ascertain the truth for herself. Her first look of inquiry satisfied her that the parlor-maid's indisposition was by no means the cause of it might be, we certainly not assumed to serve any idle or sullen purpose of her own. She perfectly understood the taking away of the remedies which the housekeeper offered, and made no further opposition to try the efficacy of a walk in the fresh air.

"I have been accustomed to more exercise, ma'am, than I get here," she said. "Might I go into the garden and try what the air will do for me?"

"Certainly. Can you walk by yourself? or shall I send some one with you?"

"I will go by myself, if you please, ma'am."

"Very well. Put on your bonnet and shawl —and when you get out keep in the east garden. The shrubbery walks in the west are damp, and then, and might feel surprised at seeing you there. Keep in my room when you have had air and exercise enough, and let me see how you are."

In a few minutes more Magdalen was out in the east garden. The sky was clear and sunny, but the cold influence of the breeze rested on the garden walk and chilled the mid-day sun. She walked toward the ruins of the old monastery, situated on the eastern side of the more modern range of buildings. Here there were lonely open spaces to breathe in freely; here the pale March sunlight rode through the sky in its elevation and decay, and met her invitingly with the genial promise of spring.

She ascended three or four riven stone steps, and seated herself on some ruined fragments lately thrown, full in the sunshine. The place she had chosen had once been the entrance to the church. Its countenance long gone by the strain of human sin and human suffering had flowed, day after day, to the confessional over the place where she now sat. Of all the miserable women who had trodden those old stones in the by-gone time, no more miserable creature had touched them than the woman whose feet rested on them now.

Her hands trembled as she placed them on either side of her to support herself on the stone seat. She had them on her lap—they trembled there. She held them out, and looked at them wonderingly — they trembled as she looked. "Like an old woman!" she said, faintly, and let them drop again at her side.

For the first time that morning the cruel discovery had forced itself on her mind—the discovery that her identity was lost. For the first time when she had most confidently trusted to it, at the time when she wanted it most. She had felt the surprise of Mr. Bartram's unexpected departure as if it had been the shock of the severest calamity that could befall her. She had perfectly smoothed away by no less a person than the admiral himself. "To the surprise of everyone in the house," he announced at breakfast that he had arranged to start for London in an hour; that he should pass the night in town; and that he might be expected to return to St. Crux in time for dinner on the next day. He volunteered to carry the communication to the housekeeper or to any one else; but it was easy to see that his errand to London was of no ordinary importance in his own estimation. He swallowed his breakfast in a violent hurry; and he was impatiently ready for the carriage when it came to the door.

Experience had taught Magdalen to be cautious. She waited a little after Admiral Bartram's departure, and then ventured on trying her experiment with the keys. It was well she did so. Mrs. Drake took advantage of the admiral's absence to enter the condition of the apartments on the first floor. The results of the investigation left no room to be satisfied her: linens and dusters were set to work, and the house maids were in and out of the rooms perpetually for long as the daylight lasted.

The evening passed, and still the safe opportunity for which Magdalen was on the watch never presented itself. Bedtime came again, and found her placed between the two alternatives of leaving the door in doubtful chances of the next morning or of trying the keys boldly in the dead of night. In former times she would have made her choice without hesitation. She hesitated now; but the wreck of her old courage still sustained her, and she determined to make the venture at night.

They kept early hours at St. Crux. If she waited the household half past eleven she would wait long enough. At that time she stole out on to the staircase with the keys in her pocket and the candle in her hand.

On passing the entrance to the corridor on the bedroom floor she paused and listened. No sound of snoring, no shuffling of infirm footsteps, was to be heard on the other side of the screen. She looked round it attentively. The stone passage was a solitude, and the trackle-bed was empty. Her own eyes had shown her old Mercy in his lower lodgings—regions more than an hour since with a candle in his hand. Had he taken advantage of his master's absence to enjoy the unaccustomed luxury of sleeping in a room? As the thought occurred to her a sound from the farther end of the corridor just caught her ear. She softly advanced toward it, and heard through the door of the second bedroom of the spare bedchambers the veteran's busy snoring in the room inside. The discovery was startling in more senses than one. It deepened the impenetrable mystery of the trackle-bed, for it showed plainly that old Mercy had no barbarous preference of his own for passing his nights in the corridor—he occupied that strange and comfortless sleeping-place purely and entirely on his master's account.

It was no time for dwelling on the reflections which this unexpected discovery might suggest. Magdalen retraced her steps along the passage, and descended to the first floor. Passing the doors nearest to her she tried the library first. On the staircase and in the corridors she had felt her heart throbbing fast and strong; but now, entering the sense of security returned to her when she found herself within the four walls of the room, and when she had closed the door on the glimmering quiet outside.

The first lock she tried was the lock of the table-drawer. None of the keys fitted it. Her next experiment was made on the cabinet. Would the same attempt fail like the first? No! One of the keys fitted; one of the keys, with a little patient management, turned the lock. She opened it eagerly. There were open shelves above, and one long drawer under them. In the shelves were a few miscellaneous and various minerals, neatly labeled and arranged. The drawer was divided into compartments. Two of the compartments contained papers. The first she discovered nothing but a collection of receipted bills. The second was filled with letters of business-documents—but the writing, yellow with age, was enough of itself to warn her that the letters were old. She shut the drawer of the cabinet; and, after locking them again with some little difficulty, proceeded to try the keys in the book-case cupboards next, before she continued her investigations in the other rooms.

The keys in book-case cupboards multiple; the drawers and cupboards in all the other rooms were unassailable. One after another she tried them patiently in their succession. All were useless. The chance which the cabinet in the library had offered in her favor was the first chance and the last.

She went back to her room, seeing nothing but her own glaring shadow, hearing nothing but her own stealthy footfall in the midnight stillness of the house. After mechanically putting the keys away in their former hiding-place she locked toward her bed—and turned away from it shudderingly. The morning recollection of what she had suffered that morning in the garden was vividly present to her mind. Another chance tried," she thought to herself, "and another chance lost! I shall sneak down again if I think of it—and I shall think of it if I lie down in the dark." She had brought a workbox with her to St. Crux, as one of the many little things which in her character of a servant it was desirable to possess; and she now opened the box, and applied herself resolutely to work. Her want of decision with her needle availed the object she had in view: it obliged her to pay the closest attention to her employment; it forced her thoughts away from the remembrance of all others which she now dreaded most—herself and the future.

At the usual day, as he had arranged, the admiral returned. His visit to London had not improved his spirits. The shadow of some unfavorable doubt still clouded his face, and his restless tongue was strangely quiet while Magdalen waited on him at his solitary dinner-table. At night the snoring resounded once more on the inner side of the screen, and Mr. Mercy was back again in his comfortable trackle-bed.

Three more days passed—April came. On the second of the month—returning at an unexpected hour as he had departed a week before—Mr. George Bartram reappeared at St. Crux.

He came back early in the afternoon, and had an interview with his uncle in the library. The interview over he left the house again, and was driven to the railway by the groom, in time to catch the last train to London that night. The admiral remarked, on the road, that "Mr. George seemed to be rather pleased than otherwise at having to go." He also remarked, on his return, that the admiral never spoke to the over-driving the horses—an indication of ill-temper on the part of a master which he considered as being entirely without precedent in all his former experience. Magdalen, in her department of service, had also remarked in the master of the old man's irritable humor: he had been dissatisfied with everything she did in the dining-room—and he had found fault with all the dishes, one after another, from the mutton broth to the toast-and-cheese.

The next two days passed as usual. On the third day an event happened. In appearance, it was certainly more important than the ringing at the drawing-room bell. In reality, it was the forerunner of perpetual catastrophe—the formidable herald of the end.

It was Magdalen's business to answer the bell On reaching the drawing-room door she knocked as usual. There was no reply. After again knocking, and again receiving no answer, she ventured into the room, and was instantly met by a current of cold air flowing full on her face. The window looking door in the farthest wall was pushed back, and the Arctic atmosphere of Freeze-your-Bones was pouring unhindered into the drawing-room.

She waited near the door, doubtful what to do next; it was certainly the drawing-room bell that had rung, and no other. She waited, looking through the open door-way opposite, down the interminable vista of bedchambers.

A little consideration satisfied her that it would be best to go down stairs again, and wait there for the second summons from the bell. In turning to leave the room she happened to look back at the window, and exactly at that moment she saw the door open at the opposite extremity of the Banqueting Hall—the door leading into the first of the bedrooms in the east wing. A tall man came out, wearing his great-coat and his hat, and rapidly approached the drawing-room. He was walking from her while he took his hat off for his features to be seen. Before he was halfway across the Hall Magdalen had recognized—

Admiral Bartram.

The admiral looked, not irritated only, but enraged, as he came at finding his parlor-maid waiting for him in the drawing-room. He inquired, sharply and suspiciously, what she was doing there. Magdalen replied that she had come there to answer the bell. His face cleared a little when he heard the explanation. "Yes, yes; to be sure," he said. "I did ring, and then I forgot it." He pulled the sliding-door back into the wall as he spoke. "Come in," he resumed, impatiently, pointing to the empty scuttle. "I want coals for the fire."

Magdalen went back to the kitchen regions. After communicating the admiral's order to the housekeeper she returned duly to attend to the fires she returned to the pantry, and, gently closing the door, sat down alone to think.

She had known her impression in the drawing-room—and it was her impression still—that she had been strangely surprised, during the time on a visit to the east rooms, which, for some urgent reason of his own, he wished to keep a secret. Her surprise had not been the result of a momentary idea that now possessed her, she hoped all logical reasoning to the contrary, but of a more concerted the suspicion of a secret proceeding on the admiral's part with the hindered suspicion which connected it with the discovery of the Secret Trust. Up to this time it had been her settled belief that he kept all his important documents under lock and key. But she felt now that she had happened to be occupying for the time being—by the merest accident—the only room in this part of the conclusion which had hitherto satisfied her mind—why might he not lock some of the rooms in the other rooms as well? The remembrance of the keys still concealed in their hiding-place in the drawing-room gave her some of the reasonableness of this new view. With one unimportant exception, those keys had all failed when she tried them in the rooms on the north side of the house. Might they not succeed with the cabinets and cupboards in the east rooms, on which she had never tried or thought of trying them yet? If there was a chance, however small, of turning her industry to account than she had turned them thus far, it was a chance to be tried. If there was a possibility, however remote, that the Trust might be hidden in any one of the locked repositories in the East wing, it was a possibility to be put to the test. When? Her own experience answered the question. At the time when no prying eyes were open, and no accidents were to be feared—when the house was quiet—in the dead of night.

She knew enough of her changed self to dread the enervating influence of delay. She determined to run the risk, headlong, that night.

More blunders escaped her when dinner-time came; the admiral's criticisms on her waiting at table were sharper than ever. His hardest words inflicted no pain on her; she scarcely heard him—her mind was dull to every sense but the sense of the coming trial. The evening, which had passed slowly to her on the night of her first experiment with the keys, passed quickly now. When bedtime came, bedtime took her by surprise.

She waited longer on this occasion than she had waited before. The admiral was at home; he might alter his mind and go down stairs again, after he had gone up to his room; he might have forgotten something in the library, and might return to fetch it. Midnight struck from the clock in the servants' hall before she ventured out of her room, with the keys again in her pocket, with the candle again in her hand.

At the first of the stairs on which she set her foot to descend, an all-mastering hesitation, an unintelligible shrinking from some peril unknown, seized her on a sudden. She waited and reasoned with herself. She had recoiled from no sacrifices, she had yielded to no fears, in carrying out the stratagem by which she had gained admission to St. Crux; and now, when the long array of difficulties at the outset had been patiently conquered—now, when by sheer force of resolution the starting-point was gained, she hesitated to advance. "I shrank from nothing to get here," she said to herself. "What madness possesses me that I shrink now?"

Every pulse in her quickened at the thought, with an animating shame that nerved her to go on. She descended the stairs, from the third floor to the second, from the second to the first, without trusting herself to pause again within easy reach of her own room. In another minute she had reached the end of the corridor, had crossed the vestibule, and had entered the drawing-room. It was only when her grasp was on the heavy brass handle of the sliding door—it was only at the moment before she pushed the door back—that she waited to take breath. The Banqueting Hall was close on the other side of the wooden partition against which she stood: her excited imagination felt the death-like chill of it flowing over her already.

She pushed back the sliding-door a few inches, and stopped in momentary alarm. When the admiral had closed it in her presence that day she had heard no noise. When old Mazey had opened it to show her the rooms in the East wing she had heard no noise. Now, in the night silence, she noticed for the first time that the door made a sound—a dull, rushing sound, like the wind.

She roused herself and pushed it further back—pushed it half way into the hollow chamber in the wall constructed to receive it. She advanced boldly into the gap, and met the night-view of the Banqueting Hall face to face.

The moon was rounding the southern side of the house. Her paling beams streamed through the nearer windows, and lay in long strips of slanting light on the marble pavement of the Hall. The black shadows of the pediments between each window, alternating with the strips of light, heightened the wan glare of the moonshine on the stone floor. Toward its lower end the Hall melted mysteriously into darkness; the ceiling was lost to view; the yawning fire-place, the overhanging mantle-piece, the long row of battle-pictures above, were all swallowed up in night. But one visible object was discernible besides the gleaming windows and the moon-striped floor. Midway in the last and farthest of the strips of light the tripod rose erect on its gaunt black legs, like a monster called to life by the moon—a monster rising through the light, and melting invisibly into the upper shadows of the Hall. Far and near all sound lay dead, drowned in the stagnant cold. The soothing hush of night was awful here. The deep abysses of darkness hid abysses of silence more immeasurable still.

She stood motionless in the door-way, with straining eyes, with straining ears. She looked for some moving thing, she listened for some rising sound—and looked and listened in vain. A quick ceaseless shivering ran through her from head to foot. The shivering of fear? or the shivering of cold? The bare doubt roused her resolute will. "Now," she thought, advancing a step through the door-way—"or never! I'll count the strips of moonlight three times over, and cross the Hall."

"One, two, three, four, five. One, two, three, four, five. One, two, three, four, five."

As the final number passed her lips, at the third time of counting, she crossed the Hall. Looking for nothing, listening for nothing—one hand holding the candle, the other mechanically grasping the folds of her dress—she sped ghost-like down the length of the ghostly place. She reached the door of the first of the eastern rooms, opened it, and ran in. The sudden relief of reaching a refuge, the sudden entrance into a new atmosphere, overpowered her for the moment. She had just time to put the candle safely on a table before she dropped giddy and breathless into the nearest chair.

Little by little, she felt the rest quieting her. In a few minutes she became conscious of the triumph of having won her way to the east rooms. In a few minutes she was strong enough to rise from the chair, to take the keys from her pocket, and to look round her.

A YEAR IN THE SERVICE.

I LOVE excitement. It was mainly to gratify this passion that I joined the army.

"The army! Just the place for a young man of spirit! What a field for adventure is the army! It is the straight road to glory and a woman's heart! Venus and Mars! Helen and Paris! Cleopatra and Antony! Love and war! Fame and patriotism!"

It was such ideas buzzing through my brain that prevented me from making out correctly a rather mixed-up account; and, in a mercurial freak, I dashed down the pen, seized my hat, and skedaddled from the counting-room. When I reached the side-walk it flashed across my brain that an old school chum was recruiting a company, and I at once struck a bee line for his rendezvous, and enrolled myself as one of the defenders of the Constitution and the Union.

When this became known I received sundry congratulations from sundry friends, all professedly strong Union men, to the effect—"You've ruined yourself"—"Thrown yourself away"—"Gone as a private"—"Too bad," etc., etc. But I "didn't see the point" on any Unionism in the remarks of these heroic lip-defenders of the nation—one of whom was self-sacrificing enough to hold an office under the Federal Government—and I returned their greeting as follows:

"Gone as a private! Yes. Am proud of it. Greater the sacrifice greater the patriotism. Go thou and do likewise!"

Then I wheeled to the right about and was off at double-quick, leaving them alone in their glory to speculate upon the rise of molasses, the fall of soap, or whether whisky was steady, and to manifest their patriotism by shouting at Union meetings for the purpose of encouraging enlistments. I was now a soldier of the nation, and did not care a straw about the opinion of the world, his wife, or any other man concerning the step I had taken. Softly—there was just one person whom I was somewhat interested to know how the news of my enlistment would be received.

Jennie Tracy was a handsome, spunky, coquettishly-inclined piece of humanity, and with whom I was deeply smitten; but I didn't intend that she should know it until I was well assured that Jennie was "willin'." With all the knowledge I had flattered myself that I possessed of the thousand-and-one meandering paths to a pretty woman's heart, I had been unable to hit upon the right one to reach hers. However, I resolved to let my love lie concealed in the bud until such time as it would have a fair chance to bloom without being nipped by a coquette's laugh.

It was on the eve of our regiment's departure that I called, in full regimentals, to say farewell to the Tracy family. Jennie received me in a manner altogether different than usual heretofore; her countenance wore a more sober cast, and I thought that I could read something of feeling in her full hazel eyes. At least I was conceited enough to believe that I was an object of interest to her; and this feeling was more fully confirmed as I detected something glisten in the corner of her eyes as I took her extended hand and said farewell, and especially as I perceived a sort of huskiness in her voice as she re-echoed the words.

I returned to camp with increased elasticity. I felt that I had at last made an impression on Jennie, and I was happy; my spirits were as buoyant as a newly-made life-boat. I was about to take the field, and I would carve out a niche in the temple of glory for her sake.

I was attached to the cavalry branch of the service, and being a prime horseman, and quick at picking up the drill, I soon attracted attention; and it was not long before I received a warrant in appreciation of my services.

For the first few months I considered that there was more reality than poetry in a soldier's life; but gradually I became used to it, and liked it better as I grew older and saw a fair chance for promotion. The sacred soil of Virginia was hospitable to us if the people were not, for it often took us in, both man and beast, to a considerable depth, and it was frequently the cause of at least one of the Ten Commandments being broken while we were endeavoring to break the back-bone of the rebellion.

It was not until I reached that region which has become famous for its Stonewall, the Shenandoah Valley, that I had my senses thoroughly awakened so that I could see the foundation upon which the superstructure of the rebellion has been raised in its true light, without the aid of a Congressional dissertation or a leader in the organ of the party.

A portion of our regiment had been detached for scouting purposes—a service just suited to my nature, full of excitement, hair-breadth escapes, ad infinitum; and while thus engaged I witnessed many scenes that caused the blood to tingle in my veins, and which entirely changed my views in regard to a question that has long disturbed the peace of my country.

It was toward sundown of a pleasant day that a detachment under my command halted at a farm-house to procure refreshments, if possible, for ourselves and horses. On entering the kitchen my attention was attracted toward two young girls, who appeared to shrink away in one corner as if in terror that somebody was about to tear them from each other. They were apparently about fifteen or sixteen years of age, neatly clad in dark dresses, and their countenance bore fresh evidence of grief, and I at once concluded that they were mourning the death of some near relative who had lost his life in this unholy rebellion. But when it was announced that we were Union soldiers I observed their features momentarily light up as if with joy, and I was at once impressed that they, at least, were not "Secesh." The striking resemblance between them, and the manner in which they seemed to cling to one another, reminded me so forcibly of the twins in "The Wandering Jew," that I instantly christened them, in my mind, as Rose and Blanche. An old negress, perceiving how intently I was watching them, approached, and with a countenance beaming with motherly love as she looked up into my face, in a low tone said:

"Dey am gwine to tuk 'em 'way down South for specumlashun, an' to keep de Linkeum sogers from stealin' em, massa; an' dey don't want to go, poor dear, bressed little souls. Poor tings! Dere ole massa only jest dead."

I started, clutched my hands, while a peculiar tremor crept through my veins as I heard these words; while the old negress, casting a mournful look toward the objects of her sympathy, shook her head as expressive of her sorrow, and I involuntarily ejaculated:

"Great God! is it possible! Are they slaves?"

The old negress, with a significant look, nodded her head in the affirmative, and then bustled away.

The fair beings before me slaves! Such things I had never dreamed of in my political philosophy. A slave had always been associated in my mind with a coarse creature with a black skin, an uncouth countenance, a woolly head, and a chain attached to the leg; and the beings before me were fair enough to be my sisters, with finely-shaped features, and a luxuriant head of hair that might cause the envy of any Caucasian belle, while a refined sensitiveness was evident in their every action; and it was some moments before I could bring my mind to realize the truth of what I had just heard.

When I had somewhat recovered from my astonishment I called the old negress one side, being anxious to learn more concerning the two beings in whom I now began to feel a deep interest. She informed me that they, until recently, were ignorant of the stain attached to their birth; that they had been educated and brought up "as white folks;" that their master, whose children "some folks reckoned dey whar," had lately died, and "dat he didn't leab no freedom papers for dem," and that they were seized upon as part of the estate, and were about being taken to Richmond for safety; that they were to leave that night, in company with some other slaves, under an escort from Ashby's rangers.

Here was a dilemma! What was I to do? Take the girls away with me? If so, I would be charged with negro-stealing, and denounced as false to the Constitution and the Union. Allow them to be taken to Richmond? If so, I would be false to my manhood. I thought of Jennie, and could not do it. No, they must not go to Richmond. They must escape from the life that there awaited them, even at the expense of my commission, which I had but a few days before received.

My companions in arms were men of intelligence, and I resolved to lay the matter before them. This I proceeded to do. When I had finished my story they to a man swore that it was my duty to prevent the girls from going to Richmond. If I did not do so I would be giving aid and comfort to the rebels. This was partly my own view of the case.

My plans were soon decided upon; and when our horses were refreshed we left the house without even communicating our intentions to the sisters, for fear they might be whispered to others and thereby reach the enemy. Taking a circuitous route so as to deceive those at the house, we came to a narrow part of the road, admirably suited for an ambush, and along which the rangers would pass, and there posting my little force as advantageously as possible, we quietly awaited their approach. The evening was clear, enabling us to see a considerable distance and pick off the rangers with our carbines without endangering those under their guard.

We awaited in this spot nearly three hours before the word was passed around that the foe were approaching. On they came, totally unconscious of their danger, and were taken completely by surprise. Several of their number were slain, three taken prisoners, and three or four succeeded in effecting their escape. The slaves, among whom were some intelligent men, were uninjured, and were rejoiced at their deliverance. But what to do with them was a question. We could not encumber our future movements with them, that was certain, and it would not do to leave them where they might fall an easy prey to the rebels. It was finally decided that all we could do was to point out the direction of our lines and bid them make their best speed toward freedom. This we did.

After this event I began to feel that I, as a member of the human family, had a greater interest in this war than I had hitherto supposed. My whole demeanor changed; my buoyant spirits gave way to a terrible earnestness of character as I began to realize the under-strata of this rebellion. I now fervently prayed God that in this upheaving of political bodies the whole social system of the South might be swept away and the Union reconstructed on a basis that would be perpetual—one that would never cause a blush to mantle the cheek of an American citizen. This change of character was noted not only by my company but by the regiment, and it was generally attributed to disappointment in love.

I had been nearly a year in the service, and during that time had not heard from Jennie. But though we did not correspond she was not absent from my thoughts. It was just on the eve of an important battle that I learned from an officer who had returned to the regiment after several weeks' absence, who I knew was somewhat acquainted with the Tracy family, that Jennie was to be married. This information I obtained in course of casual conversation. He gave it as a piece of gossip among his female friends. He further remarked that she had made particular inquiries of him concerning a Mr. —— (mentioning my real name—I had enlisted under my middle name only), and that he was unable to give her any satisfaction.

That night I dreamed of Jennie. I saw her the bride of another, and the torment I endured I can not describe. The next day found me in the midst of battle, careless of life, dashing on where danger seemed greatest and death more certain. Night found me on the battle-field severely wounded. Great God, what a night was that! The storm raged furiously; but far above its raging I could hear the moans, shrieks, and cries of wounded and dying comrades. As I lay there I thought that the hour for my departure from earth was fast approaching. My mind wandered back to my boyhood's days. Then my whole life seemed to pass panoramically before me. There was Jennie, Rose, and Blanche. I beheld Jennie as the wife of an ugly, vicious-looking man, and Rose and Blanche in a slave-pen. Then the picture passed on, and I beheld Jennie, Rose, and Blanche together in one group surrounded by smiling faces, and I made an effort to rise and join them; but the effort was too much for my strength, and I fell back exhausted and saw no more.

When I awoke to consciousness I found myself in a hospital. Here I passed three long and dreary weeks, at the end of which time I received a commission as Captain, with the intelligence of "promoted for gallantry on the field of battle." It bore date of just one year from the time of my entering the service. The surgeon assuring me that it would be some time before I would be able to resume active duty, I obtained a furlough, resolved to return and ascertain something definite about Jennie.

Just as I reached the city I met an old friend, who insisted so strenuously upon my making one of a party at his house that evening that I consented.

"Do not fail to come, for they will be there," he said, as we parted.

Who were they? He laid great stress upon the word. Could it be Jennie and her husband? Yes—it was them. But I would go: as well meet her there as at any other place. It would be better than calling at her residence, for it would appear as if it were accidental.

That evening found me true to my appointment. When I entered the room I saw a number of ladies and gentlemen grouped in a circle, apparently so intent upon listening to a conversation that my announcement was scarcely noticed. In a moment afterward I heard—

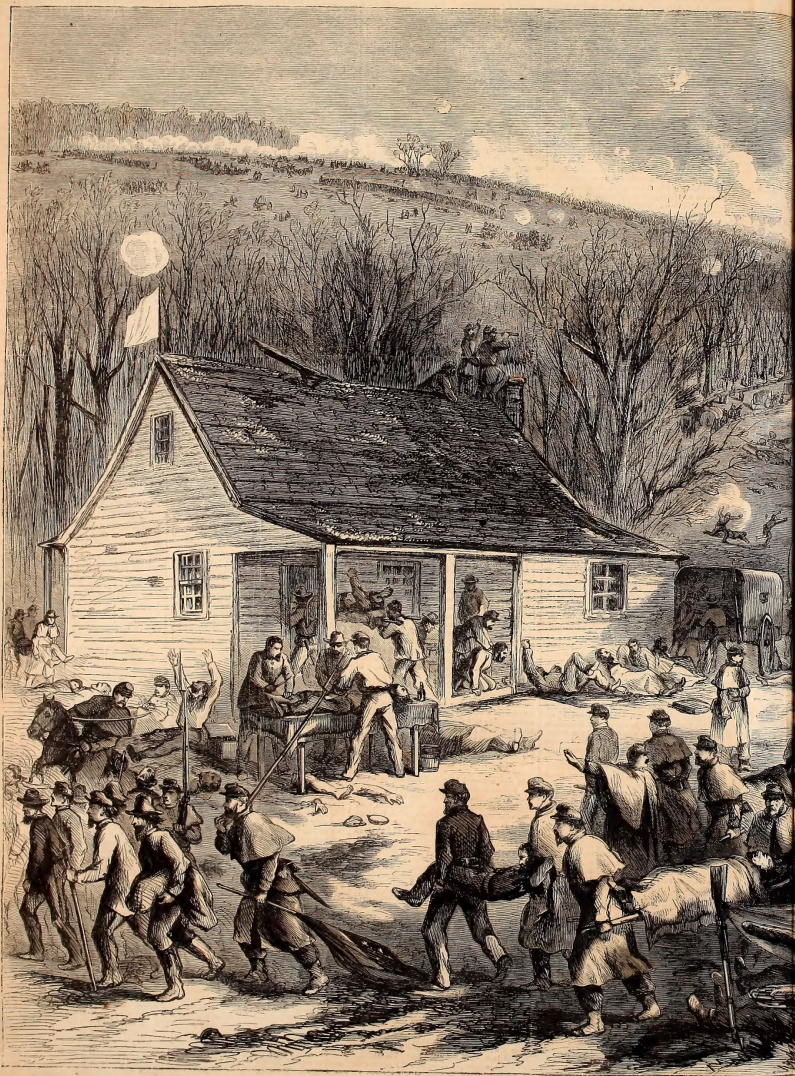
"And you never learned the officer's name?"

This was followed by a sudden shriek—a confusion—and the next instant Rose and Blanche were clinging to my well arm, and as I gazed about I beheld Jennie a short distance off looking the picture of amazement.

Explanations soon followed. Rose and Blanche had just finished a narrative of their escape as I entered. They, with the other slaves, had succeeded in reaching our lines, and attracting attention soon reached the city, and were under the patronage of the church to which my friend as well as the Tracy family belonged. Jennie had taken an especial interest in their welfare, and they were the objects of much attention—the lions of the hour.

That evening was a happy one to me—not only in seeing Rose and Blanche in safety and surrounded by friends, but in hearing that Jennie was still unmarried and that I occupied a warm place in her heart.

I am soon to rejoin my regiment, not as a single man but as the husband of Jennie, and write this to encourage young men who are in love that before they despair they should join the army. That is the true road to glory and a woman's heart. Do not wait for a commission; go as a private; for if you do your duty a year in the service will make a great change.



A BATTLE AS SEEN BY THE RESERVE.

WE publish on pages 824 and 825 a picture of a battle drawn from the station occupied by the reserve. As a general rule, battle pictures represent the shock of the actual conflict; the scenes in the back-ground are often quite as striking and worthy of being preserved. Our artist thus describes his picture:

"The drawing represents a general view of the battle-field as seen by the reserve, the line of battle off in the distance, next the artillery and second line of infantry. To the right there is a battery planted on a little hill. Across the road fresh troops are seen rapidly marching into the woods toward the front to reinforce our worn-out soldiers. Near the centre are generals, with their staffs, watching the fate of the day. The road is blocked up with cavalry, infantry, artillery, and ambulances, going to and fro, carrying their burden of wounded to the rear. On the house seen near the centre are stationed officers with signal flags. To the left is a house used as a hospital, and still further are a batch of prisoners taken off by a file of our men.

"All this and more is seen by the reserve, patiently waiting until their turn shall come to take part in the struggle of the day. The wounded are brought past them, carried so that their injuries are terribly apparent to those who are forced to stand still and coolly view their sufferings, not knowing how soon the same fate may be theirs. The air resounds with shrieks of agony, and the ground near the surgeon's table is strewed with amputated limbs. Such sights as these make some hearts sicken and sink despairingly; while in others it makes the desire to be avenged burn only the more fiercely, especially when ever and anon passes by the familiar form of a late comrade in arms, fearfully mutilated or crippled for life, or perhaps dying. One poor soldier is borne along, who, in spite of his pain, renders his last tribute of respect to his commander and cheers him as he passes.

"Out of the ambulance and supply-wagon, nearest the hospital, the wounded are lifted one after another, and laid side by side to wait wearily until the surgeon can attend to them. One loyal soldier, who has charge of the prisoners, has captured a rebel flag, and is significantly trailing it in the dust as he walks along."

Dickens's New Christmas Story.

SOMEBODY'S LUGGAGE.

[CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST NUMBER.]

HIS DRESSING-CASE.

The passengers on board the good ship Golden Dream, homeward bound from Melbourne, were beginning to get rather weary and tired of their trip. We were only in the fourth week of the voyage; but the month was July, the days were short, gloomy, and stormy; and the sea was covered with those mountainous waves which are to be seen in perfection off Cape Horn. The stout ship went struggling along within six points of a fierce northeasterly gale, quivering like a living creature as the remorseless waves struck her blow after blow. On the log being hove we found that we were making barely two knots an hour; and, to add to our perplexity, a sudden chill in the air, and a peculiar white glare in the horizon, informed us that we were surrounded with icebergs. Before nightfall the violence of the gale had somewhat abated, and the passengers hurried on deck to look at the first iceberg, which was within half a mile of us. It was a sight worth seeing. We beheld an enormous mass of rock-like ice, with a perpendicular wall facing us fully three hundred feet high, against the steep sides of which the waves dashed incessantly. The color of the iceberg was a brilliant pellucid white, except in the deep fissures and interstices, where the hue was changed to cobalt, or on the summits of the precipices, which glowed in the rays of the setting sun with all the prismatic tints of the rainbow.

"Eh! man!" exclaimed an enthusiastic Scotchman. "'Tis joost Edinburgh Castle to the life!"

"What a fortune a fellow could make among the Melbourne confectioners if he could only tow it into Port Philip during the hot weather!" remarked a prosaic colonist.

"Well, it's a pretty sight," said an old lady, "a very pretty sight! But I wish they'd all sink to the bottom at night and come up again in the morning."

"It would be very convenient, indeed, ma'am," answered the third mate. "It would save our eyes to-night considerably, for we shall have to keep a bright look-out."

We passed a very gloomy evening. The wind had almost fallen to a calm, while the sea continued to run extremely high, causing the ship to roll terribly. Every thing that was not securely fixed was flying about the cabin; the destruction of crockery was appalling; and the steward passed the interval between supper and bedtime in a state of despair, chasing cups, saucers, and bottles. Even the four passengers who clung to whist every evening with a devotion befitting the renowned Sarah Battle, were forced to give up their game. Even chess, though played on a board provided with spring fastenings, was found impracticable. The chess-board sprang up bodily, pieces and all, made a somersault in the air, darted into the cabin of a married couple who were putting their baby to bed, extinguished their candle-lamp, and frightened their cockatoo into hysterics.

For myself, I went on deck, and there, sheltered by the pent-house which overhung the main-deck at the extremity of the poop, endeavored to solace myself with a pipe. I was very glad to hear a voice out of the pitchy darkness saying,

"Nasty thick night, Sir."

It was Tom White, an able seaman, and one of the greatest growlers on board.

"What do you think of the weather, Tom?" I asked him?

"'Bout as bad as it can be. If it had kept on to blow it might have took us through all this here ice; but now it's fallen calm the bergs will gather round the ship, just as the bits of stick in a pond get round a dead cat. Ah! Once let me set foot ashore, and you'll never catch me round the Horn again!"

Poor Tom! I dare say he had uttered this declaration five hundred times before, and had always forgotten it when signing articles at the shipping-office.

"I hope they're keeping a bright look-out forward, Tom?"

"A bright look-out! How can they? Why, the night's as thick as a tub of Dutch butter. Then it ain't these big lumps as I'm afeard of. If the look-outs ain't asleep, or yarning, they might chance to see them. What I funk is the nasty little sneaking bits of ground-ice, about the size of a ship's long-boat."

"Surely they would not injure a stout ship like this, Tom?"

"Stout ship? Ha, ha! Why, this is a soft-wood ship—a regular New Brunswicker. She'd have no more chance again the ice than a chaney cup again a soup-and-bully tin; and then, with all this here copper ore in her inside, down she'd go—and you along with her."

"And you too, Tom."

"Well, I don't know about that. Sailors ain't like passengers. There's the boats to cut adrift. Besides, I'm on deck, and you'd be below, smothered like a rat in his hole."

With a series of parting growls Tom White disappeared in the darkness, leaving me in a very uncomfortable frame of mind. I was half inclined at first to stay on deck all night, but eventually determined to go below, and seek oblivion from danger in sleep.

I envied my cabin companion, the fat German, Schlafenwohl. He lay in profound slumber, while his nose trumpeted defiance to the creaking of the timbers and the dashing of the waves. Taking advantage of a favorable lurch, I clambered up to my berth, which was over the German's head. I tried to think of every thing I could recall to my memory, unconnected with ship-life, but the horrible snoring of my companion and the lurches of the ship destroyed all prospect of repose. I repeated verses from the most soporific poets I could remember. I counted numbers, and got up as far as six hundred and fifty-four, when suddenly the ship rolled more frightfully than she had done yet. I felt that she was heeling completely over, and that the main-yard must be dipping in the waves. A fearful crashing of plates and dishes was succeeded by the still more terrible sound of rushing water. I opened my eyes, which I had until now kept obstinately closed. To my horror I discovered that the port-hole, instead of being at my side, was directly above my head. I unscrewed the port and thrust my head out. I was appalled by what I beheld. The ship was on her beam-ends, and her masts were disappearing beneath the angry sea. There was no time to be lost. Fortunately I had turned in in my day clothes, boots excepted, so I climbed through the port-hole, which barely permitted the passage of my body, and lay clinging to the wet, slippery side of the vessel. A thought struck me. Shall I waken Schlafenwohl? No; I might lose my own life in endeavoring to save his. His ample figure could never pass the narrow port-hole. It is astonishing how selfish men are apt to become at such times. I murmured, "Requiescat in pace," and gazed around me once more.

The vessel was sinking rapidly. Her masts were now entirely under water, and only a few feet of her weather yard-arm were visible. I heard a horrible grinding noise. Peering through the darkness I beheld an immense iceberg crashing against the ship's side. I summoned all my energies, took a tremendous leap, and fell into a small cavity filled with freshly-fallen snow. As soon as I recovered my feet I looked once more around. The Golden Dream had disappeared, and nothing was visible save a few dark objects floating on the surface of the water.

I determined to secure one of these objects. "Possibly," I thought, "the harness-casks on deck have broken adrift. They are filled with beef and pork, and the contents of one of them would support life for months." I descended cautiously through the thick darkness to a ledge which abutted directly on the water. The spray of the breakers was dashing in my face, and I trembled lest the frail piece of ice on which I stood should give way beneath my feet and precipitate me into the briny abyss. I stretched out my hand—it was instantly grasped by another hand! I drew back in horror, and the force of my retrograde movement was such that I pulled the person who had clutched my hand completely out of the water.

As soon as I had deposited the unknown individual in a place of comparative safety I demanded his name. The figure drew a long breath, and replied, "Julius Schlafenwohl."

I staggered back in astonishment, and exclaimed, "Why, good Heaven, how came you here?"

"Very easily, my friend. You see I am a good diver and schvimmer, and I took my time about it."

"Why, you've got a long rope tied round your body!"

"Pull hart upon it and see vat you will bring op."

I hauled as he bade me, and presently landed on the iceberg a large case.

"You see," continued the German, "I am never in a hurry. Ven do sheep turned over, I turned out of my bairt myself, and den I tink to myself, Julius, you vill vant etwas essen, so I filled dis box with prog and schvam qvietly up the cabin stairs."

"My dear Schlafenwohl!" I exclaimed, embracing him, "how delighted I am to have been the means of saving your life!"

"Vell, I don't know about dat," responded the stolid German, dryly; "I could have saved myself. You see, my friend, the prog is just enough for vun—no more."

"My noble fellow!" I replied, "do not harbor such selfish thoughts. Remember we are brothers in adversity, and should help each other."

"Vot can you help me to?" asked Schlafenwohl, with a touch of sarcasm.

I stammered, "I—I've nothing, but—yes! I have a pound of tobacco! I bought it of the steward today, and here it is safe in the pocket where I put it."

"Ju—vivallera!" shouted the German, enthusiastically, "dat is just vot I have not got. Yes, my friend, we will swear brothership, and share our goods together."

"Agreed," I replied.

Schlafenwohl laid himself down with a pillow of snow for his head, and was presently snoring as tranquilly as if in his own beloved fatherland, with a federbett of the finest down to cover him. The peril of my position prevented me from sleeping. I sat down on a corner of icy rock, and took the liberty of resting my semi-frozen feet on Schlafenwohl's expansive body. I soon began to feel more comfortable. I lighted a pipe (my matches were fortunately in a water-proof case), and anxiously awaited the coming of daylight.

As I sat thus, I began to reflect on my hardness of heart. I had not bestowed a thought on the rest of the passengers, or on the crew, and yet they had probably all perished. But they had met with a sudden and speedy death, whereas I was doomed to a slow and lingering torture. Even supposing that we had a sufficiency of provisions, what prospect of rescue would remain when the last fragment of the iceberg should crumble away under the ceaseless action of the waves? Another and far greater probability was still more appalling. The durability of the iceberg would probably far outlast our store of food. I strove to realize the dreadful situation. Two human beings floating at the caprice of the wind and waves on a frail deceptive mass of crystallized water, glaring at one another with famine-stricken eyes. At length it would become necessary to cast lots and decide which should slay the other. Horrible thought! I withdrew my feet hastily from the German's body and sat, with my head bowed upon my knees, brooding. Exhausted nature yielded, and I fell asleep.

When I awoke it was broad daylight. At first I gazed around me with astonishment, as one usually does after sleeping in a strange place, and then proceeded to examine the iceberg. We had been reposing in a small valley, surrounded on every side but the one from which I had entered by steep rocks of slippery ice from sixty to eighty feet in height. We were thus completely sheltered from the piercing wind, while even the dash of the breakers was barely distinguishable. I advanced a few paces along the path of ingress for the purpose of viewing the ocean, and there found Schlafenwohl ensconced in a corner industriously combing out his flaxen beard by the aid of a pocket-mirror stuck in a crevice of the icy rocks. He was singing Kennst du das Land, and saluted me with cheerful calmness.

We breakfasted on a couple of sardines and half a biscuit, slaking our thirst at one of the numerous rills which trickled down the slowly melting rocks. There was something alarming in the idea of thus making a beverage of the house we lived in. Every gallon of water that welled away represented some six cubic inches of our fragile habitation. If this liquefaction took place in those high southern latitudes, with the temperature scarcely over forty degrees, how rapidly would our floating ark dissolve as we approached the line! If, on the other hand, we drifted antarctically, we ran the risk of being hopelessly frozen up in regions far beyond the haunts of any human creature. These terrible reflections passed through my mind while I was manufacturing, with the assistance of a pocket-knife and the lid of a deal box, a pair of sandals to protect my feet from the chilling surface of the ice. This task completed, I proposed to Schlafenwohl that we should ascend the rocks for the purpose of further ascertaining the extent of the iceberg. He assented, and, after two hours' hard work, principally spent in cutting steps for our feet with our knives, we gained the summit.

The panorama was grand in the extreme. We were full three hundred feet above the surface of the sea, which extended in every direction around us, studded at intervals with icebergs of every imaginable shape and size. Our own island was about a mile in circumference, and presented a series of ridges and valleys at irregular distances. We stood, as it were, in the centre of a gigantic star-fish, whose seven rays were represented by seven rocky back-bones, between each of which lay a deep and sheltered valley. The wind blew with great violence at the exposed point where we stood, and, as I have not a remarkable steady head, I did not care to venture too near the edge of any one of the seven abysses below. But the German insisted on it.

"Mr. Monkhouse," said he, "I vish you vould look over into our valley."

"Why?"

"I tink somebody, in our absence, may be plondering our prog-box."

"Nonsense!" I answered. "You talk as if you were on the top of the Righi."

"Vell, my friend, you vill oblige me by doing it. I am too stout to venture."

I crawled on my hands and knees until my face hung immediately over a perpendicular descent of three hundred feet. To my astonishment I beheld two human figures actively engaged in examining the contents of our invaluable chest.

I reported progress to Schlafenwohl, who became frightfully agitated. He gave vent to sundry Teutonic imprecations, and descended the face of the cliff in the most reckless manner, reaching the bottom some seconds before myself.

When I arrived I heard voices engaged in loud altercation.

"Vy, you Tom Vite, you are no better dan a tief. Dat is my box."

"That ain't your private bread," replied Tom, holding up a biscuit. "That's ship's bread. Ain't it, Bill Atkins?"

"Ay," said Atkins. "Besides, you'd never go for to keep all this tucker to your own cheek. Why, there's a parcel of women and children in the next hollow to this as has had no breakfast yet."

"What! More people saved?" I exclaimed.

"Of course there is," said Tom; "when the iceberg drifted alongside, me and Bill here stood on the bulwarks as the ship heeled over, and passed the passengers in as nicely as if we was off Blackwall Pier. There may be a lot more for aught I know in the t'other walleys. I've been busy navigating the ship."

"Navigating de sheep!" cried Schlafenwohl, "vot do you mean?"

"Why, I've got a pocket-compass here, and I've been heaving the log," said Tom. "We're steering nor'-east-and-by-north, and going thirteen knots. If this breeze lasts four-and-twenty hours we shall go smack into the Falkland Islands."

"What has become of the skipper, Tom," I asked, "and of the other officers?"

"I don't know," answered Tom; "they may be aboard the berg, and they mayn't. Anyway, I'm the only able seaman in her that I know of, so I've took the command."

The adventures of the last few hours had altered Tom White considerably for the better. From a grumbling sulking discontented fellow, he had been transformed into a smart active energetic commander. I verily believe he looked upon the iceberg as an actual ship, and so—barring masts, sails, and rudder—she was.

"Now, Mr. Monkhouse," continued Tom, "you'll please take your orders from me. I can see you're a sharp chap by the way you've made them ice-shoes and cut them steps in the rock-face. Go up to the mast-head, and see what you can make of the other valleys. The next one to this I know all about; that's my head-quarters."

"Ay, ay, Sir," I replied, in true nautical style, and once more clambered the rocks. I invited Schlafenwohl to accompany me, but he declined. On reaching "the mast-head," as Tom styled it, I selected a valley to which the descent was sloping and easy, the sides being deeply covered with snow. Down the surface of this I glided quite comfortably, and in a few seconds reached the bottom.

At first no human being was visible, but on turning an angle of the cliff I beheld a singular sight. Mrs. Robinson, the old lady who on the previous evening had wished that the icebergs would all sink to the bottom in the night-time and only come up by daylight, was seated crouching on the ground in a state of the utmost terror, holding a large green umbrella over her head. Close beside her reposed an enormous walrus, at least twelve feet long, blinking sleepily at the frightened dame, and looking as little inclined for mischief as a domestic cat on a hearth-rug. Laying my finger on my lips to enjoin silence, I fastened a rope (which I had brought with me) round Mrs. Robinson's waist, and then proceeded to toil up the slope. I should never have reached the top with her dead weight behind me but for the umbrella, which I used as an alpenstock. On gaining the summit, Mrs. Robinson vowed that she could never go down "them slippery steps;" so, aided by Bill Atkins, to whom I made signals for assistance, we lowered her safely by a long cable into the women and children's valley.

"Mr. Monkhouse," said Bill, "we must have that walrus. Even if we can't eat his flesh, we can make a roaring bonfire of his blubber, and the poor women and children are perishing with cold."

"Ay, ay, Sir."

So up three or four of us climbed again, armed with knives and cask-staves. We reached the summit and descended into the valley safely. The walrus was seated as placidly as before. He seemed to be making a journey northward to visit some of his Falkland Island acquaintance, and to look upon the iceberg as an admirable species of public conveyance—cheap, swift, and comfortable. He was, however, apparently fonder of the society of ladies than of gentlemen. As soon as he saw us approach, flourishing our weapons, he turned over on his side, and quietly rolled into the sea. Our party, chagrined at the cool manner in which he had given us the slip, returned slowly and disconsolately, communicating the result of our proceedings to Tom White.

"Never mind the walrus, boys," said that energetic commander, who was in high spirits. "She's going fifteen knots, if she's going an inch. Mr. Monkhouse," he continued, in a whisper, "you ain't seen the skipper?"

"No, there are no signs of him."

"Well, if he was aboard I'd guarantee to bring him in safe. And he couldn't do better nor what I'm doing now."

What Tom White was doing to assist our progress it would be hard to say; though he himself firmly believed that every thing depended on his exertions.

Evening was coming on. "Mr. Monkhouse," said Tom, "you're the best hand I've got aboard the ship. How do you feel about the legs?"

"Rather stiff."

"Bill Atkins," said Tom, "serve out a tot of grog to Mr. Monkhouse. It's very precious liquor, for we've only one bottle aboard; but he deserves a drop."

I swallowed the proffered refreshment, when Tom said:

"Now I want you to go aloft again, to look out for land."

"Ay, ay, Sir," I replied, cheerfully, and clambered up like a chamois.

"Land ho!" I called. My distance from Tom was upward of three hundred feet; but ice must be an excellent conductor of sound, for I could hear Tom's answer quite distinctly above the whistling of the wind and the roaring of the waves.

"Where away?"

"On the weather bow, Sir."

"All right. Stop aloft, and say what it looks like as we get nearer."

A furious gale was now blowing from sou'-sou'-west, and I was obliged to crouch on my hands and knees to avoid being hurled into one of the chasms beneath. Our gallant iceberg churned through the dark water at railroad speed, leaving a long white track of foam miles astern. My fear now was that, at the rate we were going—which could be little short of twenty miles an hour—we should be dashed on the rocks. To my great joy, as we neared the land, I perceived an extensive opening in the cliffs. I described it as accurately as I could to the watchful commander below. He presently came aloft and stood at my side.

"Port Stephens!" he exclaimed, "by all that's merciful! It lies in the sou'-west corner of the main island. Now comes the ticklish time. If we touch the rocks on either side we shall be knocked to splinters."

The excitement on board the iceberg was intense. I will not attempt to describe it. Just as night fell we entered the harbor. Had our gallant craft been steered by the most skillful helmsman in the British Navy she could not have kept a better course. Tom White rubbed his hands with delight, and appropriated all the honor and glory to himself. As soon as we were fairly inside the harbor, and under the shelter of the cliffs, the force of the wind abated. Fortunately, too, there was a strong current setting out of the harbor, right in the teeth of the wind. We hove the log, and found she was going five knots; we hove it again, a few minutes later, and she was barely making two knots; in a quarter of an hour from that time a low grinding noise was heard, and we grounded on an extensive sand-bank in the centre of the harbor. We were obliged to remain there patiently during the night, as we had no means of communicating, by signal or otherwise, with the shore. We had matches, but the whole of our available fuel amounted to a deal board or two, and so small a fire would, probably, have attracted no observation. We passed a nervous, miserable night, and the poor women and children especially. As the iceberg grated backward and forward on the top of the bank we feared she was going to pieces; but her timbers (to speak metaphorically) were well put together, and she held out bravely until morning.

Never in my life did I feel so glad to see the day dawn. We were unspeakably delighted at about sunrise to observe several boats putting out from the settlement. The people in them had put off (it seemed when they came alongside) from motives of curiosity to visit the iceberg, but were perfectly astonished at finding her freighted with passengers.

The official in charge of the boats said, "We must observe some discipline in getting the people on board, or we shall have the boats swamped. Where is the captain?"

"I am the captain," quoth Tom White, boldly.

"Then, Sir, perhaps you will have the kindness to arrange your people in detachments."

Tom bustled about with great pomp, looking fully two inches taller after having been called "Sir," and having been addressed so politely by the government officer.

By this time more boats had arrived from shore, and the scanty population of the port were to be seen running to and fro like ants whose nest had been disturbed.

"Are these all your crew and passengers, captain?" asked the governor of the island, as he stepped aboard the iceberg.

"Hall, your worship," answered Tom, apparently with some indistinct impressions of veneration, derived from the Thames Police Court; "the others," he continued, solemnly, "has met a watery grave."

"Beg your pardon, Sir," said a boatman, touching his cap to Tom White, "but there's a lot more people t'other side the berg."

A rush of boats immediately gave way with a will to the spot indicated, and presently returned, bringing off the captain, chief mate, second mate, third mate, boatswain, doctor, steersman, and midshipmen. Being in the after-part of the ship when the catastrophe occurred they had all leaped on board the iceberg together. And it seemed that we had searched six valleys, but had omitted to examine the seventh.

Poor Tom White! I believe he was a kind-hearted fellow, and well-pleased to find that not a single life had been sacrificed on board the Golden Dream; and yet I am sure he was sorry to see the captain again. He spoke not a word on his way to the shore, but hung down his head and looked much depressed. In the evening, however, under the influence of a liberal libation of grog from His Excellency the Governor, he recovered his spirits, and described his manner of navigating the iceberg into port in terms which I think no Falkland Islander will ever forget. As for the iceberg, I understand that she remained for many months grounded on the sand-bank; at length, under the influence of numerous storms of rain, the ceaseless dashing of the waters, and the warmth of the chilly southern summer, she crumbled to pieces and disappeared.

We were all placed on board a Californian trader bound for New York. Here I parted from Schlafenwohl, who had determined to settle in the United States. There was some slight coolness between us. I had positively declined to share the same cabin with him on account of his snoring, and the worthy German was offended. Consequently I proceeded to Liverpool by the Cunard steamer from Boston alone. On reaching London I at once forwarded a written statement of our extraordinary escape to the Committee at Lloyd's. It was authenticated by Tom White's mark; as he, like many other great men, was unable to read or write. A few days afterward I received a requisition to attend before the Committee of Lloyd's, which I at once obeyed, when the following conversation ensued between myself and the Chairman:

"Pray, Mr. Monkhouse, is your family of German origin?"

"No, Sir; we have been settled for centuries in East Kent."

"Oh, I beg your pardon; I thought the name of Monkhouse might have been a corruption of the name of a certain Baron whose extraordinary adventures have long been known to the public."

HIS BROWN-PAPER PARCEL.

My works are well known. I am a young man in the Art line. You have seen my works many a time, though it's fifty thousand to one if you have seen me. You say you don't want to see me? You say your interest is in my works, and not in me? Don't be too sure about that. Stop a bit.

Let us have it down in black and white at the first go off, so that there may be no unpleasantness or wrangling afterward. And this is looked over by a friend of mine, a ticket-writer, that is up to literature. I am a young man in the Art line—in the Fine Art line. You have seen my works over and over again, and you have been curious about me, and you think you have seen me. Now, as a safe rule, you never have seen me, and you never do see me, and you never will see me. I think that's plainly put—and it's what knocks me over.

If there's a blighted public character going, I am the party.

It has been remarked by a certain (or an uncertain) philosopher, that the world knows nothing of its greatest men. He might have put it plainer if he had thrown his eye in my direction. He might have put it, that while the world knows something of them that apparently go in and win, it knows nothing of them that really go in and don't win. There it is again in another form—and that's what knocks me over.

Not that it's only myself that suffers from injustice, but that I am more alive to my own injuries than to any other man's. Being, as I have mentioned, in the Fine Art line, and not the Philanthropic line, I openly admit it. As to company in injury, I have company enough. Who are you passing every day at your Competitive Excruciations? The fortunate candidates whose heads and livers you have turned upside-down for life? Not you. You are really passing the Crammers and Coaches. If your principle is right, why don't you turn out to-morrow morning with the keys of your cities on velvet cushions, your musicians playing and your flags flying, and read addresses to the Crammers and Coaches on your bended knees, beseeching them to come out and govern you? Then, again, as to your public business of all sorts, your Financial statements, and your Budgets; the Public knows much, truly, about the real doers of all that! Your Nobles and Right Honorables are first-rate men? Yes, and so is a goose a first-rate bird. But I'll tell you this about the goose—you'll find his natural flavor disappointing without stuffing.

Perhaps I am soured by not being popular? But suppose I AM popular. Suppose my works never fail to attract. Suppose that whether they are exhibited by natural light or by artificial, they invariably draw the public. Then no doubt they are preserved in some Collection? No they are not; they are not preserved in any Collection. Copyright? No, nor yet copyright. Any how they must be somewhere? Wrong again, for they are often nowhere.

Says you, "At all events you are in a moody state of mind, my friend." My answer is, I have described myself as a public character with a blight upon him—which fully accounts for the curdling of the milk in that cocoa-nut.

Those that are acquainted with London are aware of a locality on the Surrey side of the river Thames called the Obelisk, or more generally, the Obstacle. Those that are not acquainted with London will also be aware of it, now that I have named it. My lodging is not far from that locality. I am a young man of that easy disposition that I lie abed till it's absolutely necessary to get up and earn something, and then I lie abed again till I have spent it.

It was on an occasion when I had had to turn to with a view to victuals that I found myself walking along the Waterloo Road, one evening after dark, accompanied by an acquaintance and fellow-lodger in the gas-fitting way of life. He is very good company, having worked at the theatres, and indeed he has a theatrical turn himself and wishes to be brought out in the character of Othello; but whether on account of his regular work always blacking his face and hands more or less I can not say.

"Tom," he says, "what a mystery hangs over you!"

"Yes, Mr. Click"—the rest of the house generally give him his name, as being first, front, carpeted all over, his own furniture, and if not mahogany, an out-and-out imitation—"Yes, Mr. Click, a mystery does hang over me."

"Makes you low, you see, don't it?" says he, eying me sideways.

"Why yes, Mr. Click, there are circumstances connected with it that have," I yielded to a sigh, "a lowering effect."

"Gives you a touch of the misanthrope too, don't it?" says he. "Well, I'll tell you what. If I was you I'd shake it off."

"If I was you I would, Mr. Click; but if you was me you wouldn't."

"Ah!" says he, "there's something in that."

When we had walked a little further he took it up again by touching me on the chest.

"You see, Tom, it seems to me as if, in the words of the poet who wrote the domestic drama of the Stranger, who had a silent sorrow there."

"I have, Mr. Click."

"I hope, Tom," lowering his voice in a friendly way, "it isn't coining, or smashing?"

"No, Mr. Click. Don't be uneasy."

"Nor yet forg—" Mr. Click checked himself, and added, "counterfeiting any thing, for instance?"

"No, Mr. Click. I am lawfully in the Art line—Fine Art line—but I can say no more."

"Ah! Under a species of star? A kind of a malignant spell? A sort of a gloomy destiny? A canker-worm pegging away at your vitals in secret, as well as I make it out?" said Mr. Click, eying me with some admiration.

I told Mr. Click that was about it, if we came to particulars; and I thought he appeared rather proud of me.

Our conversation had brought us to a crowd of people, the greater part struggling for a front place from which to see something on the pavement, which proved to be various designs executed in colored chalks on the pavement-stones, lighted by two candles stuck in mud sconces. The subjects consisted of a fine fresh salmon's head and shoulders, supposed to have been recently sent home from the fishmonger's; a moonlight night at sea (in a circle); dead game; scroll-work; the head of a hoary hermit engaged in devout contemplation; the head of a pointer smoking a pipe; and a cherubim, his flesh creased as in infancy, going on a horizontal errand against the wind. All these subjects appeared to me to be exquisitely done.

On his knees on one side of this gallery, a shabby person of modest appearance who shivered dreadfully (though it wasn't at all cold), was engaged in blowing the chalk dust off the moon, toning the outline of the back of the hermit's head with a bit of leather, and fattening the down-stroke of a letter or two in the writing. I have forgotten to mention that writing formed a part of the composition, and that it also—as it appeared to me—was exquisitely done. It ran as follows, in fine round characters: "An honest man is the noblest work of God. 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 0. £. s. d. Employment in an office is humbly requested. Honor the Queen. Hunger is a 0 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1 sharp thorn. Chip chop, cherry chop, fol de rol de ri do. Astronomy and mathematics. I do this to support my family."

Murmurs of admiration at the exceeding beauty of this performance went about among the crowd. The artist having finished his touching (and having spoiled those places), took his seat on the pavement with his knees crouched up very nigh his chin; and half-pence began to rattle in.

"A pity to see a man of that talent brought so low: ain't it?" said one of the crowd to me.

"What he might have done in the coach-painting, or house-decorating!" said another man, who took up the first speaker because I did not.

"Why he writes—alone—like the Lord Chancellor!" said another man.

"Better," said another. "I know his writing. He couldn't support his family this way."

Then a woman noticed the natural fluffiness of the hermit's hair, and another woman, her friend, mentioned of the salmon's gills that you could almost see him gasp. Then an elderly country gentleman stepped forward and asked the modest man how he executed his work? And the modest man took some scraps of brown paper with colors in 'em out of his pockets and showed them. Then a fair-complexioned donkey with sandy hair and spectacles, asked if the hermit was a portrait? To which the modest man, casting a sorrowful glance upon it, replied that it was, to a certain extent, a recollection of his father. This caused a boy to yelp out, "Is the Pinter a smoking the pipe your mother?" who was immediately shoved out of view by a sympathetic carpenter with his basket of tools at his back.

At every fresh question or remark the crowd leaned forward more eagerly, and dropped the half-pence more freely, and the modest man gathered them up more meekly. At last another elderly gentleman came to the front and gave the artist his card, to come to his office to-morrow and get some copying to do. The card was accompanied by sixpence, and the artist was profoundly grateful, and, before he put the card in his hat, read it several times by the light of his candles to fix the address well in his mind, in case he should lose it. The crowd was deeply interested by this last incident, and a man in the second row with a gruff voice growled to the artist, "You've got a chance in life now, ain't you?" The artist answered (sniffing in a very low-spirited way, however), "I'm thankful to hope so." Upon which there was a general chorus of "You are all right," and the half-pence slackened very decidedly.

I felt myself pulled away by the arm, and Mr. Click and I stood alone at the corner of the next crossing.

"Why, Tom," said Mr. Click, "what a horrid expression of face you've got!"

"Have I?" says I.

"Have you?" says Mr. Click. "Why you looked as if you would have his blood."

"Whose blood?"

"The artist's."

"The artist's!" I repeated. And I laughed frantically, wildly, gloomily, incoherently, disagreeably. I am sensible that I did. I know I did.

Mr. Click stared at me in a scared sort of a way, but said nothing until we had walked a street's length. He then stopped short, and said, with excitement on the part of his fore-finger:

"Thomas, I find it necessary to be plain with you. I don't like the envious man. I have identified the canker-worm that's pegging away at your vitals, and it's envy, Thomas."

"Is it?" says I.

"Yes, it is," says he. "Thomas, beware of envy. It is the green-eyed monster which never did and never will improve each shining hour, but quite the reverse. I dread the envious man, Thomas. I confess that I am afraid of the envious man, when he is so envious as you are. While you contemplated the works of a gifted rival, and while you heard that rival's praises, and especially while you met his humble glance as he put that card away, your countenance was so malevolent as to be terrific. Thomas, I have heard of the envy of them that follows the Fine Art line, but I never believed it could be what yours is. I wish you well, but I take my leave of you. And if you should ever get into trouble through knifeing—or say, garroting—a brother artist, as I believe you will, don't call me to character, Thomas, or I shall be forced to injure your case."

Mr. Click parted from me with those words, and we broke off our acquaintance.

I became enamored. Her name was Henerietta. Contending with my easy disposition, I frequently got up to go after her. She also dwelt in the neighborhood of the Obstacle, and I did fondly hope that no other would interpose in the way of our union.

To say that Henerietta was volatile, is but to say that she was woman. To say that she was in the bonnet-trimming, is feebly to express the taste which reigned predominant in her own.

She consented to walk with me. Let me do her the justice to say that she did so upon trial. "I am not," said Henerietta, "as yet prepared to regard you, Thomas, in any other light than as a friend; but as a friend I am willing to walk with you, on the understanding that softer sentiments may flow."

We walked.

Under the influence of Henerietta's beguilements I now got out of bed daily. I pursued my calling with an industry before unknown, and it can not fail to have been observed at that period, by those most familiar with the streets of London, that there was a larger supply— But hold! The time is not yet come!

One evening in October I was walking with Henerietta, enjoying the cool breezes wafted over Vauxhall Bridge. After several slow turns Henerietta gaped frequently (so inseparable from woman is the love of excitement), and said, "Let's go home by Grosvenor Place, Piccadilly, and Waterloo"—localities, I may state for the information of the stranger and the foreigner, well known in London, and the last a Bridge.

"No. Not by Piccadilly, Henerietta," said I.

"And why not Piccadilly, for goodness' sake?" said Henerietta.

Could I tell her? Could I confess to the gloomy presentiment that overshadowed me? Could I make myself intelligible to her? No.

"I don't like Piccadilly, Henerietta."

"But I do," said she. "It's dark now, and the long rows of lamps in Piccadilly after dark are beautiful. I will go to Piccadilly!"

Of course we went. It was a pleasant night, and there were numbers of people in the streets. It was a brisk night, but not too cold, and not damp. Let me darkly observe, it was the best of all nights—FOR THE PURPOSE.

As we passed the garden-wall of the Royal Palace, going up Grosvenor Place, Henerietta murmured,

"I wish I was a Queen!"

"Why so, Henerietta?"

"I would make you Something," said she, and crossed her two hands on my arm, and turned away her head.

Judging from this that the softer sentiments alluded to above had begun to flow, I adapted my conduct to that belief. Thus happily we passed on into the detested thoroughfare of Piccadilly. On the right of that thoroughfare is a row of trees, the railing of the Green Park, and a fine broad eligible piece of pavement.

"O my!" cried Henerietta, presently. "There's been an accident!"

I looked to the left, and said, "Where, Henerietta?"

"Not there, stupid," said she. "Over by the Park railings. Where the crowd is! O no, it's not an accident, it's something else to look at! What's them lights?"

She referred to two lights twinkling low among the legs of the assemblage: two candles on the pavement.

"O do come along!" cried Henerietta, skipping across the road with me; I hung back, but in vain. "Do let's look!"

Again, designs upon the pavement. Centre compartment, Mount Vesuvius going it (in a circle), supported by four oval compartments, severally representing a ship in heavy weather, a shoulder of mutton attended by two cucumbers, a golden harvest with distant cottage of proprietor, and a knife and fork after nature; above the centre compartment a bunch of grapes, and over the whole a rainbow. The whole, as it appeared to me, exquisitely done.

The person in attendance on these works of art was in all respects, shabbiness excepted, unlike the former person. His whole appearance and manner denoted briskness. Though threadbare, he expressed to the crowd that poverty had not subdued his spirit or tinged with any sense of shame this honest effort to turn his talents to some account. The writing which formed a part of his composition was conceived in a similarly cheerful tone. It breathed the following sentiments: "The writer is poor but not despondent. To a British 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 0 Public he £ s. d. appeals. Honor to our brave Army! And also 0 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1 to our gallant Navy. BRITONS STRIKE the A B C D E F G writer in common chalks would be grateful for any suitable employment HOME! HURRAH!" The whole of this writing appeared to me to be exquisitely done.

But this man, in one respect like the last, though seemingly hard at it with a great show of brown paper and rubbers, was only really fattening the down-stroke of a letter here and there, or blowing the loose chalk off the rainbow, or toning the outside edge of the shoulder of mutton. Though he did this with the greatest confidence, he did it (as it struck me) in so ignorant a manner, and so spoiled every thing he touched, that when he began upon the purple smoke from the chimney of the distant cottage of the proprietor of the golden harvest (which smoke was beautifully soft) I found myself saying aloud, without considering of it:

"Let that alone, will you?"

"Halloa!" said the man next me in the crowd, jerking me roughly from him with his elbow, "why didn't you send a telegram? If we had known you was coming, we'd have provided something better for you. You understand the man's work better than he does himself, don't you? Have you made your will? You're too clever to live long."

"Don't be hard upon the gentleman, Sir," said the person in attendance on the works of art, with a twinkle in his eye as he looked at me, "he may chance to be an artist himself. If so, Sir, he will have a fellow-feeling with me, Sir, when I"—he adapted his action to his words as he went on, and gave a smart slap of his hands between each touch, working himself all the time about and about the composition—"when I lighten the bloom of my grapes—shade off the orange in my rainbow—dot the i of my Britons—throw a yellow light into my cow-cum-ber—insinuate another morsel of fat into my shoulder of mutton—dart another zigzag flash of lightning at my ship in distress!"

He seemed to do this so neatly, and was so nimble about it, that the half-pence came flying in.

"Thanks, generous public, thanks!" said the professor. "You will stimulate me to further exertions. My name will be found in the list of British Painters yet. I shall do better than this, with encouragement. I shall indeed."

"You never can do better than that bunch of grapes," said Henerietta. "O Thomas, them grapes!"

"Not better than that, lady? I hope for the time when I shall paint any thing but your own bright eyes and lips, equal to life."

"(Thomas, did you ever?) But it must take a long time, Sir," said Henerietta, blushing, "to paint equal to that."

"I was prenticed to it, Miss," said the young man, smartly touching up the composition, "prenticed to it in the caves of Spain and Portingale, ever so long and two year over."

There was a laugh from the crowd; and a new man who had worked himself in next me, said, "He's a smart chap, too; ain't he?"

"And what a eye!" exclaimed Henerietta, softly.

"Ah! He need have a eye," said the man.

"Ah! He just need," was murmured among the crowd.

"He couldn't come that 'ere burning mountain without a eye," said the man. He had got himself accepted as an authority somehow, and every body looked at his finger as it pointed out Vesuvius. "To come that effect in a general illumination would require a eye; but to come it with two dips—why it's enough to blind him!"

That impostor, pretending not to have heard what was said, now winked to any extent with both eyes at once, as if the strain upon his sight was too much, and threw back his long hair—it was very long—as if to cool his fevered brow. I was watching him doing it, when Henerietta suddenly whispered, "O Thomas, how horrid you look!" and pulled me out by the arm.

Remembering Mr. Click's words, I was confused when I retorted, "What do you mean by horrid?"

"Oh gracious! Why, you looked," said Henerietta, "as if you would have his blood."

I was going to answer, "So I would, for twopence—from his nose," when I checked myself and remained silent.

We returned home in silence. Every step of the way the softer sentiments that had flowed ebbed twenty mile an hour. Adapting my conduct to the ebbing as I had done to the flowing, I let my arm drop limp, so as she could scarcely keep hold of it, and I wished her such a cold good-night at parting that I keep within the bounds of truth when I characterize it as a Rasper.

In the course of the next day I received the following document:

> "Henerietta informs Thomas that my eyes are open to you. I must ever wish you well, but walking and us is separated by an unfarmable abyss. One so malignant to superiority—Oh that look at him!—can never, never conduct HENERIETTA.
> "P.S.—To the altar."

Yielding to the easiness of my disposition, I went to bed for a week after receiving this letter. During the whole of such time London was bereft of the usual fruits of my labor. When I resumed it I found that Henerietta was married to the artist of Piccadilly.

Did I say to the artist? What fell words were those, expressive of what a galling hollowness, of what a bitter mockery! I—I—I—am the artist. I was the real artist of Piccadilly, I was the real artist of the Waterloo-road, I am the only artist of all those pavement-subjects which daily and nightly arouse your admiration. I do 'em and I let 'em out. The man you behold with the papers of chalks and the rubbers, touching up the down-strokes of the writing and shading off the salmon, the man you give the credit to, the man you give the money to, hires—yes! and I live to tell it!—hires those works of art of me, and brings nothing to 'em but the candles.

Such is genius in a commercial country. I am not up to the shivering, I am not up to the liveliness, I am not up to the wanting-employment-in-an-office move; I am only up to originating and executing the work. In consequence of which you never see me: you think you see me when you see somebody else, and that somebody else is a mere Commercial character. The one seen by self and Mr. Click in the Waterloo Road can only write a single word, and that I taught him, and it's MULTIPLICATION—which you may see him execute upside down, because he can't do it the natural way. The one seen by self and Henerietta by the Green Park railings can just smear into existence the two ends of a rainbow with his cuff and a rubber—if very hard put upon making a show—but he could no more come the arch of the rainbow, to save his life, than he could come the moonlight, fish, volcano, shipwreck, mutton, hermit, or any of my most celebrated effects.

To conclude as I began: if there's a blighted public character going, I am the party. And often as you have seen, do see, and will see, my Works, it's fifty thousand to one if you'll ever see me, unless, when the candles are burned down and the Commercial character is gone, you should happen to notice a neglected young man perseveringly rubbing out the last traces of the pictures, so that nobody can renew the same. That's me.

HIS PORTMANTEAU.

I.

MR. BLORAGE walked up and down his dining-room on the 31st of December, 1851, with the air and step of a man at peace with the world and pleased with himself. As he turned to and fro there was a little swing of exultation in his gait, which no friend (had there been any friend present to witness it) would have recognized as a trait peculiar to Mr. Blorage. On the contrary, he passed among his neighbors and acquaintance as a man of a modest and sedate temperament, and of an extreme good nature: so that those same friends and neighbors, full of the impudence of the world, often laughed at the former, and let no opportunity slip of taking advantage of the latter. But he was accustomed to be imposed upon. In fact, it was his business, his vocation, to which he had been apprenticed from his earliest childhood.

It is recorded by his nurse and mother that so amiable, so complacent a baby never was born. A faint whimper was the only complaint he made, after lying for hours in his cradle wide awake, with nothing but a damaged tassel to amuse him, as it swung to and fro from the hood of the cradle in the draught—which draught reddened his baby nose, and brought the water into his little weak eyes. As he grew up it became an established fact that Master Dick was to be washed first or last, taken out or left behind, given sugar-plums or forgotten, as it happened to suit the peculiar fancy of every other person rather than Master Dick himself, because he was so sweet-tempered. Thus he weathered babyhood, encountered childhood, and rushed up into boyhood, in a pleasing and satisfactory manner to all parties, himself included. He never worried his mother by catching infectious diseases at wrong times; he went through the necessary ailments of childhood—such as measles, whooping-cough, and scarlatina—with the least possible degree of trouble to all parties concerned; and caused no anxiety by having relapses or taking colds. If he cut his finger to the bone, no one knew of it unless any one chanced to notice the scar. If he fell into the river, he scrambled out, and dried his own clothes by the convenient process of airing them on his own body. If he fell off a tree, down a well, over a wall, he picked himself up and bore his burden of bruises with silent composure. In addition to these accomplishments, he bore any amount of other people's work, and seemed rather to enjoy being "put upon." He was glad to be obliging, and "gave up" with quite as much zest as other natures about him delighted to "take all." Once, and once only, did a slight attack of ill-temper and discontent assail him. His father, without any previous notice, without the shadow of a consultation as to any faint bias on Dick's part, but just because "he was Dick, and would be sure to do it, whether he liked it or not," placed him, at the age of sixteen years, as the junior of all the junior clerks, in a Bank.

Now Dick was a country boy, born and brought up in truly rural fashion. His father having a small estate, farmed the greater part of it himself, and, being a practical man, did nothing by halves. His children participated in all that he did, as much for their own benefit as for his. The boys were active young farmers from the time they were breeched; and the girls reared chickens, and understood the immaculate cleanliness of a dairy before they could spell their own names. So Dick's habits, and what little idiosyncrasy he had of his own, belonged wholly to the country.

He was up with the lark, roaming over his fa che's premises, and lighting upon all sorts of charitable things to do. A brood of young ducks, always ornate, obstinate, and greedy, had squeezed their mealiginous little bodies through nothing, and were out on the loose, their vigilant foster-mother, "in a fine frenzy," clucking within the shut-up poultry-house. It was Dick's business to open the door and give her last ones to her chirping wings; and all the acknowledgment he got was an unmistakable infliction on the part of the irritated mother that he alone had been the cause of the separation. He delighted to stagger under a load of fodder, taking so high as to be invaluable wages, the glad neigh of the expectant horse, or the genial grunt of the cow. He was even, from the mutatinal quarrel of the bantam-cock and the great bubbling-cock, he caused "to be set at variance the sky little jostlers and covertly threw handfuls of grain to the scattering parties. He dared not so much as look upon a crumb within sight of the great monarch of the barn-yard.

Having meddled and messed in every thing that was going on in the high delight of doing he did nothing else, Dick would return to the house, brush and clean himself with scrupulous exactness, and place himself ready to receive his master's morning kiss on his cheek, rosy, soap-fed, cherubic. After that he began the real business of the day. He nursed the baby, made the tea, cut the breadand-butter, shelled the eggs, fetched fuel and water, ran the messages, and took what breakfast he could between whiles. When he had a few minutes to spare he could roll his own be roamed about, saving young birds from murderous kidnappers, rescuing mice in pies and kittens from untimely fates, helping little maidens over high stiles, and actively and zealously to carry fagots of sticks, assuredly stolen from his father's hedge-row.

Dick possessed one harmless propensity—never to be on a hill without saying it had been necessary for running to the top of it in so many minutes, and spending down to the bottom again in so many minutes less. He considered it as the only point in society at large, to be able to say in how short a time another man could reach an appointed goal heaven.

For these reasons, and a thousand more such, Dick's dismay may be comprehended when he was suddenly required to exchange forever the sunny and flowery plains for the high stool, matching the higher desk, in a dusty closely confined counting-house. Book-office, in a close dull unsavory street.

Dick began a remonstrance. He said first time in his life there rose to his lips the murmur of a complaint. He was upon the point of—he was wounded sound fell was his younger brother called Milton to his godfathers and godmothers. Bill to Bess who had no particular regard for him, or he for them, and Billy by the fortunate possessors of what affection he had. Generally called for the first thing that did not concern himself, he was visibly startled by the unwonted noun, and Billy said under the shock of surprise:

"Come, come, old fellow! None of that."

"But I don't like the Bank, Billy. I can subsist, I think I may say, handsomely upon what I get at the place makes me sick; I get the cramp in my legs from sitting on that high stool; I am no nervous—

"Hold hard, Dick; I won't have you say anything of the sort. How dare you talk like that to me?"

"My dear Billy—"

"Don't dear Billy me. When you know as well as I do, that if you don't stay at the Bank I shall have to go myself—"

"Oh dear!" ejaculated Dick.

"Oh dear!" mimicked the fact younger brother. "I wonder you have the heart to hint an objection, Dick—speaking of myself, as you do, as living on the Bank. Endangering your own brother! And you getting up by taking a genteel situation, fellow!"

Dick said no more, but manfully bore up against manly cramps, nervous, and headaches, with the mental comfort of consolation, "How lucky poor dear Billy is saved all this!"

Time worked its own cure, and he experienced in his own person the truth of that well-known copy-book maxim." Habit becomes second nature." He experienced his promotion to stool by doing a great deal of other people's work besides his own; by cherishing office and fellow-clerks by constantly assisting them out of a persistent search into ink-bottles; and being generally kind-hearted to everybody and every body.

He was universally liked, though vastly imposed upon; still, upon his gradual elevation, in course of time, from one of the juniors to head of all, there was no voice but his own to proclaim the fact, and dwell on the favors of election. He was a little uncomfortable himself at last he could not be put on a place one of the others might have coveted or better deserved.

At last assured that his abilities and position warranted his marriage, Dick resigned himself to being entirely happy, and—a fall essential to a state of bliss—to Bess.

That his choice should light on one profoundly unlike himself was perfectly natural; for Bess was not of much beauty and many waste being exactly the thing to appeal to Dick's love of doing. She had been possessed of brains, or of sufficient capacity to use into the depths of Dick's most honest heart, she might have ruled there, queen and wife, with the honesty of a kingdom would have enrolled her in all eyes; but, like a playful kitten, she preferred to slily lurked in her prettiest ways. Her character may be inferred from the manner of her wooing. She wooed her husband.

"Indeed, Mr. Dick, you are very good! How you have surprised me!" And do you really think so well of me? I never thought you cared for me in a bit for me. I laughed and chatted with you because, as we said, Mr. Richard Burge was my fast-guaranteed."

Good-natured to you, Ellen! Oh Heaven! could you read nothing more in my devotion? But the despair, strongest, most conscious—

"You quite amaze me, Mr. Richard! Where have you kept these feelings so long?"

"Oh, Ellen! Do not trifle with me!"

"No! Not for worlds, Mr. Blorage! I am so flirt. I am a frank creature, and always tell all I have dared to speak—oh, Ellen—I would not have dared to speak then, my love my heart—before you, had you not encouraged—"

"Now, Mr. Richard, don't say that, for I'm sure I am above that. Besides, mamma wishes me to marry rather high. She wishes me to set my younger sisters a good example; and indeed I feel that as the elder than mine I ought to be well never suffer me to marry a banker's clerk."

"I am to be a partner in two years."

"Two years! I may be married long before then. Come, Mr. Richard, don't, I'm cast down. We can always be the best of friends."

"And my wife, Ellen?"

"Oh dear no! I really wonder you could ever think of such a thing—so good-natured, as you are. Pray don't tease me any more."

Poor Dick's tender heart swelled and throbbed with many tender emotions; but he really was too good-natured to let any angry or bitter thoughts divide it. He rallied his flattering and bewildered senses, looked round for his hat (an article that always seems of great comfort in moments of difficulties), looked into it, and not finding a single word in it to help him out, went away speechless with a single bow. It was a bow worthy of Sir Charles Grandison or Lovelace, and was a better bow than Sir Charles Grandison ever made. It was a quiet dignity in it, expressive of so much pride and gentleness, that it was a bow that was fully substitute for a heart which had no mocked him with a single throb.

Time, that never-failing plaster which heals so many wounds, came to Dick's aid. He received a melancholy satisfaction from working twice as hard as he had ever done before. He was at that once odious office before the doors were opened, and not an hour departed without some new gardlies of cramp. From always being a compassionate and generous man, Dick became morbidly so: appearing to regard the whole of his acquaintance as victims to unrequited love, upon whom it was necessary to bestow a double vigilant care of the most forbearing and affectionate nature.

Not even then, although assisted full of pity, Jem, Bill, or Billy could make him think he was an object of pity.

"She's a flirt, and no mistake. I saw through her long ago, but I'll be hanged if I could tell you so."

"You wrong her, William—you deeply wrong her. She was right in her decision. She deserved not to be the wife of a banker's clerk."

"Pooh, pooh! Ha, ha! Why, you have a share in the firm already, and may call yourself a banker at once, and I hope to the Lord you will soon get a wife worthy of you. Heaven knows I've no ways to be able to turn to you when one wants five hundred pounds."

"Do you want a little money now, Billy? I have some money on board wages."

"The very thing I do want, my dear fellow. I have got into a scrape, Dick. It's a great comfort to me, Dick, that you didn't marry that simpering girl."

"Hush, Bill."

"Well, it's very good thing for yourself, then. I'll swear she was a screw."

"Forbear, Bill."

"Well, it's no uncommon good thing for her, then."

That is my only consolation," sighed the good Dick, as he handed his brother a bundle of notes, which, for the time, relieved the carefully counted over twice.

"Twenty-five pounds; thank ye, Dick."

II.

Bless us! Mr. Blorage has been a long time without appearing in that dining-room of his. Had the volatile Ellen, at the last moment that he walked up and down with that elastic step? No, no. She had not thrown away the chance of bidding Dick—had married an Honorable by name, if not by nature, but the title helped to the natural consequence that the fact there is no need to inform Society. If Dick's prayers could make her happy she was supremely blest.

No. Mr. Blorage existed, because he was dining in his own new, substantially built, elegantly furnished dining-room, contemplating with the first time, and he had thought naturally a solemn man, upon the whole of his present and future circumstance, drank success to it, and health to himself, and prosperity to his wife, whose health was running riot in his brain like an express engine going for a wager. He was the good and pleasant age of thirty-five, an independent gentleman, with thirty thousand pounds in possession, and safely deposited in the only bank that never breaks—the heart of a true woman. He had just built a lucrative and independent position in the very Bank where he had formerly been but as his not a responsible partner, he was only the considerable manager." For, as to partnership, thought Dick, he would never ask for me to lend my money through the speculations of others. I could not help it, poor Billy! I could not help my first-rate London school. As to my dear mother, Old Yorkshire, she would have died if I put her in?" just fell in, at time to make her comfortable."

Dick had grown rich, nobody quite knew how. He was always happy to see one, perhaps he realized the promise. "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and it shall be found after many days." He had done so, and found it. He had made one or two fortunate speculations, but Dick, the happy by old Grotius, was a morose brother clerk, who had not given him a civil word when alive, but bequeathed him all he died worth, and Dick was rich. Dick was rich, and Blorage, his heir, would be sure to spend it better than he had done. Dick's prayers, first ascertaining that there were no real heirs, had forthwith purchased a friend. He was rich, and because the owners wanted to sell them, and because no one but a rich man could afford to buy them. No sooner, however, did they become Dick's than they were dreadfully out of fashion. Dick's taste was way ran straight through them: the land was the very thing for building upon, and what was pleasanter than all, no one envied Dick. Every one said, "Lucky dog, Dick Burge right; he's a good fellow, and it's his due."

Dick was so decided to build himself a new house on this spot that he commenced it even before, one fine and near, entered into the scheme. The plans were approved of, and the first sure were for a building of patric property. The architect was received with a friendly shake of the hand, men were looked upon as part of the community. The house grew, rose, was finished, and with a quiet and minute inspection of all the neighbors. The laying of the foundation was a popular joke; the roofing-in was nearly followed by a merry-go-round, and the chimney-pots, the cherry from the assembled multitude. The first inhabitants of the structure were as rapturously hailed by all Dick's friends that it might have been supposed Mr. Blorage had privately intimated to the whole of them, individually and collectively, that he was about to make such a present of the achieved piece of architecture.

Of course there was to be a house-warming—a dinner and a dance—and Dick, with the most delightful identical fite, to come off the very next day, that could not Dick's engagements for the day before? Not because his dinner was to be so well appointed, not because his wines (he knew that a Tells too well this evening!) were unexceptionable, not because the music provided was the best that money could hire, not because his rooms were beautifully decorated, his chintzes of the sweetest patterns, his carpets Axminster and Brussels; but because two out of the sixty invitations he had issued had been accepted. Why two? And what two? In the whole selected circle of Mr. Blorage's brain he could only have answered, "Upon those two hangs my fate—the fate of my house."

He threw himself into one of those delightful spring-seated sloping-backed softly-cushioned armchairs, in which one's whole existence was never had the good fortune to repose. He took another glass of wine, placed his feet upon the fender, and his nose already rather ethereal.

"Yes, I am happy now. Lovely creatures! Bill doesn't like Fanny; he says she is like Ellen. Ah, poor Bill! He is not to be pitied for the rejection of those two cousins. Billy seems rather full of Florence. Well, well, that can't know about it—but it would never do to ruin poor Bill's happiness; I know what happiness is—and love is. I am not in love with Ellen, but you, see, I got over it." (When one means to say a thing, it is.) "Ah, but how glad I am that Florence is to be married. But I should like to know what that very quiet—still I have served me, I mean. Bill will have it she's unhappy. I hope not. Bill is not to be trusted in love affairs—if I submit—it, in short, I am taken in again. Bill says she is not. I don't know. I don't understand woman at all. I believe every word they say; I adore every soft smiles and winning glance, and I would not—nay, I could not—think ill of them for the world. I suppose I am a fool, as Bill says I am. What a thing it would be for me if some kind-hearted honest genius or fairy would endow upon me the power to give the gift of love to people appear just as they are, speak just what they think, that to be altogether! Ah, future mate mine! Where I was young, surely I read of a palace of truth belonging to some fairy—King, I fancy. Pardon—called Pluator. To be sure they got into a world of difficulties, but how much less miserable. But they were French people; whereas a good honest Englishman likes the truth, and will speak it whether he's miserable or not."

Mr. Blorage uttered the last sentence aloud, with great emphasis on the auxiliary verb; apparently giving force to his words by an energetic thump on the arm of his chair.

"My dear Sir take care!" said a voice in his ear. The sound was that of Billy's brother-in-law's body clear as a note of music.

Looking round, he found the good Dick pen reived, perched on the arm of the chair, a little of truth bottom-heavy, and his brother-in-law Bess on the cushion, by holding valiantly on to an elaborately crocheted antimacassar.

"I—I beg your pardon," stammered Mr. Blorage.

"Granted," said Billy. "Now open your hand and hold it steady."

Always ready to oblige, Mr. Blorage did as he was asked, and was considerably surprised that he was not surprised when she took a flying leap into the centre of his hand.

"Thank you, Dick," said she, arranging her little crushed skirts, "I owe you an apology. Do you want your house to be gifted with the power of truth-telling, Mr. Blorage?"

"I should like it," he answered, in some confusion.

The little lady shook her head.

"No, no, no. You will find it very annoying. Neither your servants, nor your friends, nor your relations will seem the better for it, Dick."

"Dick!" thought Mr. Blorage, "she called me Dick for one day," he stammered, in answer to the wise proceedings of Billy's little lady.

"I understand. Merely to enable you to select your friends. Is that your object, Mr. Burge, Dick."

"Yes, yes," he answered, eagerly. "Marriage needs as much selection as life does not mind being made a fool of for a short time—but for life!" Dick was a fool for life. The little lady was nearly upset by the shock.

"I will endeavor to save myself from falling the unfolded a pair of beautiful wings, whose transparent lustre of prismatic colors formed a sort of fairy round her head.

"How pretty you are," said Dick.

"Thank you, Mr. Burge! I have no appreciate me. My name is Veritis."

"Good Heavens!" said Dick. "I don't care about the enchantment of my house if you are to be always telling me the truth."

"I mean to live with you, Dick; but as for advice, you know I never give you an intelligence to guide you through every difficulty. You will have to knock at the door of your conscience for unerring guidance?"

"True," murmured Dick; "but still—"

"I see you hold to your own way, Dick, and as I will not force myself upon you I will grant your request. But inasmuch as enchanting the whole house, and consequently every person in it, is a more ways than one, I will confine the spell to this room. The following conditions to be observed—two conditions—before I enchant the chair.

"Name them."

"The first is, that no one but yourself is to be allowed to sit in it during their possession."

"Dear me," exclaimed Mr. Blorage, dubiously, "what is the second?"

"The second condition is, that whoever enters within your room shall sit in the chair, and must answer three questions before leaving the chair."

"But suppose they will do neither the one nor the other?"

Compliance with the first condition I will take upon myself to insure; the second condition you can't. It is you who must put the three questions."

"What three questions?"

"Pooh, pooh, Dick, don't give me more than my share of trouble. Put your own three questions to put, in order to obtain the good for which you have purchased me. Enchant the chair, you are undeserving of the favor."

Dick would have protested, but he was so fearful of disturbing the equilibrium of the delicate little creature's temperament at the moment that he only opened and shut his mouth.

"Dick, Dick, I shall be off, must be gone, though. The night is rather chilly, I think." She folded her arms in an almost human pocket a shadowing sort of cobwebby thing, wound it round her head, and then, with wonderful cleverness, drew it over her head, and tying it under her chin, "I shall be back, gentlemen," "Good-night, Dick. And good fortune to this house! And may it soon possess the only charm it wants—young wife for you, and a good mistress for itself!"

Before Mr. Blorage had time to answer, the palm of his hand was empty, and the fair little creature had disappeared.

III.

Mr. Richard Blorage was never quite clear during how long a time after the spirit's disappearance he sat thinking and dreaming. But the dining-room door having opened and shut several times during the prescribed period of absence, he was at length because conscious that it was not likely that the servants would shut of his own accord, and that it had probably been so under the hand of Jem, the butler, his new butler, the most respectful and obsequious of butlers, who had come into his service with a character so very unexceptionable, to be the last thing in the world to shock the spotless Penge for being so good as to take him for such a master.

Mr. Blorage rose hastily and rang the bell, being answered at once apparently by a party the supposition that when it rang he had once again had his hand on the door-handle.

Mr. Blorage was about to speak to the excellent Penge, when he was arrested by seeing that excellent butler seat himself with much familiarity in the chair his master had just vacated—the enchanted chair. He was sooner seated than he appeared, and was instantly changed. His countenance assumed an air of mooth self-complacency; he drew out from the depths of a mysterious pocket a snuff-box, helped himself to a pinch, and shook off a calm and deliberate manner.

"Penge," said Mr. Blorage, "he remarked; "I trust it is not disagreeable? Will you take a pinch?"

"Thank you, Sir."

Villains, ruffians, rogues, and fast men, are always forewarned, and, at the first start any slight attack of that weakness, they take care not to show it. Mr. Blorage, honest, natural creatures are constantly surprised, and are consequently a long time before they can recover themselves. So Mr. Blorage gazed at his butler, open-mouthed and open-eyed, and was not at all surprised, until he was suddenly recalled to a perception of the fact that he was in the face of the man who prepared out behind the chair.

The look of fun had performed her part of the contract, and had seated the butler in it by some supernatural power. Mr. Blorage could not perform his part of the contract.

As he stared, his eyes, ran his fingers through his hair, and blew his nose, perfectly unable to decide what questions he should put to Penge, the confident air of the man, looking through the conspicuous mock humility, moved Mr. Blorage to a hearty and violent fit of laughter. Whether he was sorry for Penge, though he felt that he alone was to blame for the position of the situation, restrain himself from laughter he could not.

"Penge," says Penge, "your great self-possession, 'you 'are a right to unsuse yourself at Penge, because I am not yours drunk?"

"Penge?"

"Penge. I ain't to be sure of the truth of the you. Yes'e drunk."

"Drunk or sober, I think I am a gentleman, Penge?"

"You may think so," returned the model butler, with great contempt; "but I don't. The notion of a real gent sin't by no manner o' means the same as a fine gentleman."

"And what are your ideas?" asked Dick, in a hurry, glad to hold off or wait for a new situation.

Dick blushed a little, as the model butler, with the easily duty to get this, his first visitor, out of the Chair of Truth and Enchantment.

"At all events, I hope you are comfortable, Penge? I trust you have had at least my share of ice."

"No, I don't, Blorage. I am formed for enjoyment; and how can I know enjoyment under a mean-spirited system that keeps the key of the wine-cellar?"

"But you agreed with me, Penge, when I engaged you, that it was the most satisfactory arrangement for all parties. Penge, you said you preferred it."

"Blorage, I considered as it looked well so to say: and having been used to a many fine story, what I said to myself was, 'Penge! you stick that to him, and you'll get the key of your wine-cellar your it out.' Which is what I expect, Blorage, or have I been fooled?"

Burning to release the prisoner, Mr. Blorage was racking his brain for the most delicate way to a furious peal of the door-bell suggested a very one.

"Who can that be, Penge?"

"Most likely some young scamp your brother."

Then, instantly rising, Mr. Penge said, in his most respectful possible manner, "I ask your pardon, Sir. I felt so very giddy just now that I had not took the liberty to take a seat I must have fainted."

"Never mind. Make no excuses, Penge."

"Thank you, Sir. I believe I will take a chair, Sir. This is such a cheerful young gentleman, Sir, that I always like the liveliness of his age." And Penge disappeared with alacrity.

The good Dick was in the chair, intending to occupy it himself during his brother's visit. But Penge was there much quicker than he.

"Hallos, Dick! What do you want with the best chair in the room? It is very unlike such a good-natured chap as you to appropriate the most comfortable seat."

He was in the chair! Dick sat down on the edge of another chair and wiped his forehead.

Bill, with his usual impetuosity in the magic chair, assumed a very rakish sad-up indifference, and commenced whistling a tune perfectly silent. Probably William was uncomfortable in the position of the second position, and, pushing his brain for three questions—three simple, harmless questions—to put to his brother, was about the weather? Nothing better. Bill could answer impromptu somewhat about the weather.

"Is it a fine night, Billy?"

"Fine enough for me. I want to shake off to Barnes's without being seen, and I came here on my way, partly to blind mother, and partly to twist a fellow into one out of you. Barnes's was a disreputable gaming-place.)

"Is it a fine afternoon?" interrupted Dick, in a violent hurry.

"Confounded cross. Bothering as much about my goings on as if I was cutting my teeth!"

"Is it a fine morning, you in love, Bill?"

"Yes; with myself. What's the good of loving any body else? I don't feel as if I could love a second fond of me as to forget himself or herself."

"I thought Florence—" interrupted Dick, hastily.

"Florence be hanged! Do you suppose I don't see that you are spooney upon Florence? But lookee here, Dick; you want to marry; now, I don't intend to let you marry. I'm not going to stand your being thrown away upon any other than your own relations."

"Come out of that chair, Bill!"

"I won't. It's a comfortable chair. I'm bent on telling you my mind. My mind has been full of you, Dick, ever since you began to build this house. That's a suspicious gallery, shut off by a green baize door. I said when I saw it, that means mischief. He means that part of the house for a Nur—"

"Come out of that chair, Bill!"

"I tell you I won't. As to your getting married, I'm not afraid of Fanny; her temper will never stand a month's courtship. She'll show her teeth in a fortnight. When I turned this matter over in my mind, I said to myself, 'Dick is safe from her. But Florence,' I said, 'may be dangerous; therefore I'll pretend to be a little affected that way myself.'"

"Here, Bill! Take five pounds—take ten pounds—but come out of that chair!"

"I would have done it for less than that, Dick, but as you are so flush and free of money, I'll take the ten. Good-evening, Dick; I promised mother to be back to tea."

With this sudden change Mr. William took himself out of the chair, and took his leave. Mr. Richard—too well pleased to have got him out of the chair to care for any thing more, and knowing that his nerves were incapable of bearing further strain—rushed up stairs and dived into bed. And, as if fearing that the chair would pursue him even there, and entice people to commit themselves, he pulled the bed-clothes over his head, and was fortunate in being unconscious during the rest of the night.

IV.

WHEN Mr. Blorage awoke in the morning he was reminded by a slight headache that something unusual had occurred; but he came out of his cold bath as lively and fresh and full of spirits as if he were the combined essence of two or three dozen Mr. Blorages. He pranced down stairs—his own newly-built and Brussels carpeted stairs—like a young colt philandering in a clover meadow.

This was the great day of the house-warming, to be followed by events that were perfectly bewildering from the ecstasy of their anticipation. He was brought back to a state of common human bliss by a strong smell of burned wood or varnish, and found that in making the tea (he had lost himself in thinking how soon some fair hand might be making tea for him) he was endeavoring to stuff his little hot kettle (which phizzed and sputtered a remonstrance) into his new tea-poy, while the caddy appertaining thereto was catching fire on the hob.

Remedying these mistakes with the utmost expedition, in turning round he suddenly encountered the chair, and suddenly remembered its fatal property.

What was he to do? How get rid of the chair? Should he send it away? Should he lock it up? Should he destroy it? burn it? annihilate it? bury it?

As he seized hold of it, with the intention of performing one or other of these acts, he was conscious of a shock; his arms fell powerless to his sides; and a little fluttering noise made him look up. There, on the head of a chair, was the Lady Verita, her wings expanded, her tiny foot just poised on the carved shining top of the chair.

"It is of no use, Dick," she said, her little voice tinkling like silver music. "This chair was not enchanted merely for your whim. Sit down and listen to me."

Dick obeyed, and held out his palm. His heart leaped with joy as the little lady sprang lightly on to it.

"Lend me your watch, Dick, to sit upon."

Dick complied, and placed his watch with infinite care and gentleness for her use.

She seated herself gracefully, having folded her wings. Once more drawing out her fleecy atom of a handkerchief, she used it after the manner of mortals; though Dick hardly supposed that any thing so infinitely delicate as her nose could stand the test.

"Now, Dick, how naughty you are! You do not use my gift as you ought. Why were you thinking of burning my chair? Simply because it had done its duty in enabling you to see people as they really are, and know their thoughts?"

"But I do not wish to know them."

"My dear Dick, infinite Wisdom has given you susceptibility, intelligence, and reason. You only use the first. You are commanded to love your neighbor, but your susceptibility should not lead you into confounding all moral distinctions among your neighbors. Reason should step in, and enable you to make a practical use of susceptibility and intelligence. Do I make myself understood? I have had to read up for it."

"Lovely and beloved little creature, I know I am a fool, but let me reap the fruits of my want of wisdom. I would rather be foolish for life than entrap others into sitting in this chair."

"Dick, you require a lesson. Use it well, be patient, be submissive, and all will end well, both for you and for me. I hear your door-bell ringing. Adieu, Dick. Be wise and prudent."

The radiant wings expanded, the little handkerchief was tied under the tiny chin, and as Penge opened the door to usher in a visitor the little lady vanished.

"Be wise and prudent." The words kept tinkling a little silver sound in the ears of Mr. Blorage as he rose and welcomed the visitor shown in by Penge. His first essay at being wise and prudent made him hand her (for it was a female) at once into the post of honor—the Chair of Truth.

He was glad to perceive that his visitor was a pleasant little mild girl whom he had met once or twice at Dr. Evans's, the medical man of the neighborhood. He had a general idea that she was the daughter of an invalid widow, and that she was the eldest of a flock of brown healthy-looking children, to whom she acted as foster-mother, owing to the inability of their real mother to do any thing but lie on the sofa, and sigh for ease from pain and poverty.

He had so far noticed little Gatty Bland (who, by-the-way, was twenty-three years old, perhaps more) as to admire her eyes, soft and brown, the exact color of her hair. As she now sat in the enchanted chair, he was surprised at himself for never having noticed that she was really pretty. Her sweet innocent face had a bewitching air about it that peculiarly pleased him. And really, her tiny hands and her graceful movements strongly reminded him of the ways of the little Lady Verita.

"Mamma has sent me here this morning, Mr. Blorage, to beg your acceptance of the loan of a beautiful china bowl. There is not another like it in England, and she fancied it would be just the thing to hold a Trifle to-night."

"I thank her very much; but how did she know that I was going to have a Trifle to-night?"

"Oh, we know it very well. You give a ball to-night, and from our house we can see the lights, and faintly hear the music. Jenny and Albert are to sit up to-night a little longer than usual that they may watch the carriages."

"Then if I accept the loan of the beautiful china bowl, I must ask a favor in return."

"I will promise to perform it, Mr. Blorage, for I feel sure you will not ask any thing that I may not promise to perform."

"I am proud of being so trusted. I should wish to beg the favor of your company to-night, to see how well the Trifle looks in the beautiful china bowl."

"Ah, how I wish we could come! But we are very poor, and mamma is too great an invalid to take us out. We shall find much pleasure, though, in watching your gayety from our window, and we shall be delighted to think that our china bowl has helped to ornament your supper-table. Mamma was sure you would not consider the offer of it an impertinence."

No, indeed! Dick was an adept in the happy art of accepting a kindness in the spirit in which it was offered.

"Mamma has had great pleasure in watching the building of your house, Mr. Blorage. She said, a good man is going to inhabit it, and a good man always benefits a neighborhood."

"Your mamma is very kind," murmured Dick, a little confused, and beginning to blush. He was admiring Gatty Bland so much that he had forgotten she was a prisoner, and unconscious of the frankness of her words.

"Mamma is very good, Mr. Blorage, as we, her children, know. And I ought to return to her. I promised not to be absent more than half an hour, and it must be that now."

But though she looked distressed and anxious, poor Gatty could no more move until Mr. Blorage released her than the house could move.

He wiped his brow, ran his fingers through his hair, and prepared for action.

"And so your mamma is glad to have a near neighbor?"

"She is glad that you are our neighbor. When it pleases Heaven to release her from trouble and pain, and to begin our lonelier life of struggle, she thinks that the sunshine of a good man's heart may sometimes fall on her poor children in the shade."

"So it shall, my dear, please God! But, Gatty, you must marry.—Would you like to marry?"

"I don't know, Mr. Blorage; but I fear few will care to marry a little plain girl, with a turn-up nose, and a heart full of her own people, and who wants a nomination for—"

"Have you ever seen any one you would like to marry?" interrupted Dick, pleased with his wealth of questions.

"Only one, and that is you, Mr. Blorage! Good-by. I must run all the way home."

Finding herself released, Gatty sprang up, and ran out of the room: leaving Mr. Blorage turning from his natural color to white, from white to pink, from pink to crimson, from crimson to purple.

"Poor little dear thing, that I could have been so base and dishonorable as to ask her such a delicate question, when I had so many safe questions to ask—her age, her brothers' and sisters' names and ages, her godfathers and godmothers—if she liked new milk, cheese, eggs. Gracious Heaven! that I should have dared to put so preposterous a question, and receive such a—such a—such a—" Dick could not bring himself to name the quality of the answer. "But it's very pleasant to be so undeservedly appreciated—to be liked and loved for one's own sake. She is a nice little thing; she is a pretty little thing. Her nose certainly turns up; but I believe there never was a silly person known with a turned-up nose. She is very graceful. She flitted out of the room like a bird out of a rose-bush. I wonder what nomination she wanted!"

For the first time since it was enchanted Mr. Blorage looked complacently at the chair; but his meditations were interrupted by a respectful intimation from Penge that his master would oblige every body by getting out of the way, because the market-gardener had arrived with his flowers and decorations, the carpenter was waiting with his nails and ruler, and the Mr. Gunter of those parts was frantic to begin setting up his lights. So Mr. Blorage got out of the way for the rest of the day, and reappeared at dinner-time in due course, and afterward became the observed of all observers, as he led out the (in those parts) highly renowned and celebrated Lady Fitzcluck to open his ball with an old-fashioned country-dance.

Every thing had gone off well, up to the proud moment when Mr. Blorage drew on his new kid gloves for the (in those parts) eminently aristocratic Lady Fitzcluck. She was bulky, but she was light in hand, and she and Mr. Blorage danced with a spirit worthy of the occasion. Half way down thirty couples, Mr. Blorage became conscious of a circumstance. A stately old dowager was seated, in the centre of a circle of chairs, in the Chair of Truth. Howsoever it had got there, by whatsoever mysterious agency it had been brought there, there it was, with the dowager in it. She was encircled by a crowd, to whom she was holding forth, and evidently in no complimentary strain. Mr. Blorage rushed out of the country-dance at the instant when he ought to have paraded the (in those parts) highly fashionable Lady Fitzcluck down the middle; he rushed back again, and danced vehemently; he grasped the hand confidingly held across to him in the execution of the figure hands across, as if it were the throat of a burglar; in all the hurry, worry, and confusion he must think (and could not think) of three appropriate and respectful questions to put to that terrible and otherwise immovable old dowager. With his responsibility staring him in the face, he had hurled Lady Fitzcluck through a narrow gorge of dancers, when an unfortunate button of his coat entangled itself in the lace of a lady's dress, and in the perturbation of his feelings he went down the middle and up again, carrying a long and tattered shred, that lengthened as he went. Fanny's was the dress—Fanny was the sufferer. But she looked up into his face so forgivingly, and her soft blue eyes so smilingly met his, and her rosy lips spoke his pardon in such sweet tones, that he mentally said, "Dear, lovely Fanny, what an angel! What bliss to be loved by Fanny!" But when Florence stepped forward from among the dancers, with eager concern, her bright cheek flushed, her dark eyes sparkling, and her voice attuned to the gentlest tones of commiseration for the damage done to "dear Fanny's dear love of a pretty dress"—when she gracefully begged her partner to excuse her, "that she might pin up the dear love's tatters"—then Mr. Blorage felt very much inclined to repeat the above sentence over again, substituting the name of Florence for Fanny. Meantime all eyes were attracted to the horrible dowager in the Chair of Truth. Had any Painter been present he would have gone on his knees to beseech that dowager to sit to him for the personification of a Gorgon. Mr. Blorage felt, after all, that he could no more dare to ask her a question than if she had been his Black Majesty from below, arrayed in gorgeous female attire. There she must sit until kind Fate stepped in with three questions and released her. As he looked hopelessly toward the door, he saw the little piquante nose of Gatty Bland showing itself in good relief against a black coat near her. She had a little laced handkerchief tied under her chin; she went toward the dowager, changing the little laced kerchief into her hand; in her plain white dress she conveyed the dowager, all purple and gold, down the room, out at the door, and into the tea-room. He blessed Gatty Bland mentally, and finished his dance with high credit to himself, and perfect satisfaction to the (in those parts) rather-difficult-to-please Lady Fitzcluck. As soon as he was free he flew to seek a partner, either in Fanny the Fair or Florence the Beautiful.

They were together, and almost alone. They were together—horror!—in the Chair of Truth; Fanny on the cushioned seat; Florence on the stuffed arm. Florence was still employed in pinning up the tatters of the torn dress of Fanny.

"What a beautiful picture; what a lovely contrast!" thought Dick, as he approached.

"There, Dear!" said Florence, with a remarkably emphatic stress upon the last word; I have pinned you up, and done the best I could for you, Dear. But I am glad to see, notwithstanding, that you are a monstrous figure, and not fit to look at, Dear."

"Thank you, Florence, Dear!"

"Ah, you false thing! I see through your meekness and your affectation, as if you did not care about your dress. It is a pity Mr. Blorage can't see you at home."

"It's a pity Mr. Blorage can't see you at home. Aunt longs for the day when she can rid herself of you: indolent, selfish, and useless creature that you are."

"But Aunt comforts herself with the reflection that she has not such a fire-brand in her house as you are. Aunt can well afford to put up with a little indolence where there is so much good temper."

"It is better to be a little passionate than sulky, Love."

"Is it, Love? Mr. Blorage is the best judge of that. We have all our tempers, and you don't expect a perfect wife, do you, Mr. Blorage?"

"I am very imperfect myself," murmured the unfortunate Dick.

"Oh no, Mr. Blorage," cried Fanny and Florence together: "You are every thing that is nice and good-tempered. And this is such a love of a house that no one could be unhappy here."

Here the duet ceased, and solos began.

"You would always be cross and fractious, Fanny," said Florence.

"And you would always be rude and boisterous, Florence," said Fanny.

"For you are a virago, and you know you are," said Florence.

"For you are a hoyden, and you know you are," said Fanny.

"I am ashamed of you, my darling," said Florence.

"I am disgusted with you, my precious," said Fanny.

"Ladies, ladies!" expostulated Dick.

"She has the vilest temper, Mr. Blorage!" cries Florence.

"She can't speak a word of truth, Mr. Blorage," cries Fanny.

As Mr. Blorage turned hurriedly and appealingly from the one to the other, each now exclaiming, "Throw your handkerchief to me, Mr. Blorage!" he lost his balance, rolled over, and rolled the chair over. Picking himself up with all possible dispatch, and turning to apologize, he found that Florence, Fanny, music, lights, flowers, dancers, Lady Fitzcluck, and dowager, had all disappeared. There was nothing near him but the chair—overturned—and an empty wine-bottle.

V.

"Thank Heaven!" were the first spoken words of Mr. Blorage. His first act was to look for his handkerchief, which he hoped he had not thrown to either of the ladies. It was safe in his pocket. "It must have been a dream," he next remarked, eying the chair dubiously. "Yes, of course a dream," as he gathered courage from its motionless state. "But a very bad dream," as he felt encouraged to touch it, raise it, and examine it. As harmless a chair as ever upholsterer stuffed or gentleman bought! Gently he restored it to its proper place.

A knock at the door. Immediately followed by the appearance of the model Penge. It seemed an agreeable and satisfactory circumstance to the respectful Penge that his master was on his legs and awake.

"Shall I remove the things, Sir? It's close upon nine."

"Do so, Penge. And I think I will have a cup of coffee—rather strong, Penge."

"Yes, Sir."

What a relief it was not to see Penge sit down in the chair!

"It's a delicious cup of coffee, Penge," said Mr. Blorage, when it was brought, "and it so perfectly agrees with me that I think I'll take a run over to Dr. Evans's and play a game of chess with him."

The sharp night air smote him with a sudden giddiness, and every twinkling star appeared to be closely embracing a twin star that twinkled with still greater vigor; but he soon got over these delusions, and before he reached Dr. Evans's door was quite himself. On the way, however, he took himself seriously to task:

"How good of the night to be so fresh and fine, how kind of the pure stars to beam down on me so brightly, when I am a man full of evil and weak thoughts. I harbored a design against my fellow-creatures of the basest sort; and, to add to my crime, it was directed against one whom I meant for a wife! True, I know nothing of Miss Fanny or Miss Florence but the beauty of those two cousins, and a general sort of amiability that seems to belong to all girls. I'll make it my business to see more of both, and I'll try to be guided to a right choice at last."

Mr. Blorage was warmly welcomed by Dr. Evans, who opened the door to him.

"Now this is friendly. I have had a very anxious case, which has caused me much worry these three days. It is happily past the crisis now, and I was just saying to my wife how I should enjoy your stepping in."

"I am heartily glad I came."

"Of course you are. You are always kind and seasonable. When were you ever otherwise?"

The good Dick followed the Doctor (who was a voluble and hearty doctor) up the stairs into the presence of Mrs. Doctor. But Dick was unable to acknowledge Mrs. Doctor's cordial greeting by so much as a single word; for there before his eyes, seated on a little chair by Mrs. Evans's side, was Miss Gatty Bland, her innocent little face peeping out of a handkerchief tied over her head and under her chin.

"You know dear little Gatty, of course?" remarked the Doctor. "She is waiting for her mother's medicine.—I hope you have given Gatty a cup of tea, my dear?"

Mrs. Doctor's face expressed a profound contempt for Mr. Doctor's unnecessary reminder.

Meantime Dick sat down. He awaited with the calm composure of a victim of Fate for Miss Bland to offer him the use of her mother's beautiful china bowl.

She did nothing of the sort. In the ensuing half hour she made no allusion whatever either to china or to bowls, though the conversation turned upon no other subject than his approaching house-warming.

Dick was half sorry. He felt as if it would be so agreeable to thank such a charming little girl. If her mother had lent him her china bowl (he felt sure she possessed a china bowl) he must have called to thank her, and he felt a desire to become intimate with the family. He might, perhaps, be of service to them; was there any thing—or nothing—in that nomination he so nearly heard about? He invited Gatty to the house-warming, and anticipated her request for Jenny and Albert; he was not at all surprised to find that she had a sister Jenny and a brother Albert. But it did surprise him to see how pretty she became when joy flushed her cheeks and brightened her eyes, while several little dimples in the nicest corners of her face discovered themselves as she smiled her thanks.

"The very thing!" said Mrs. Evans; "a little gayety does more good than all my doctor's physic. Mr. Blorage, my dear, very thoughtful. You'll expect all four, I dare say—three girls and a boy."

"Only four! I expect eight at least."

"But, Mrs. Evans," whispered Gatty, "one of us must stay with mamma; that will be I, you know."

"My dear, I will see to that. I will step down in the morning, Gatty, and settle it all with mamma."

"And tell mamma from me," said the Doctor, "that I shall spend a couple of hours with her to-morrow evening. I want to study her case, and I shall like a little rest between your dances, Blorage."

"That is," said Gatty, smiling delightedly, "that you two are most kindly going to represent me for that time."

"Just so, my dear. What! Are you off, Gatty? Stay. We'll send our man Mike with you; the railway has brought a lot of ill-looking people about."

"Let me take you home, Miss Bland," said Dick.

"Oh! Thank you very much, Mr. Blorage. I own some of the people frighten me, though I think they mean no harm."

"We will have a game of chess when you come back, Blorage," says the Doctor.

What passed between little Gatty and her escort, and whether any thing passed on the subject of china bowls, nobody knows. The walk did not last longer than ten minutes. My private opinion is, that Dick treated Gatty all the way with the respect and deference due to a young princess accidentally committed to his care. When he returned to his game of chess, what with the remaining fumes of that bottle of wine, the extraordinary dream, and this odd approach to an interpretation of it, it is certain that he was in a romantic mood. He willingly listened to a long history of the Blands, during which Mr. and Mrs. Doctor maintained a laudatory duet very different indeed from the imaginary duet between Fanny and Florence.

"I only wish," cried the Doctor, at last, "that I had a son of thirty or thirty-five, with a good house, a good income, and a good heart. I would recommend him Gatty Bland for a wife with all my heart and soul, and he would thank me every year of his life ever afterward, even though he had to marry her whole family along with her!"

"Miss Bland," said Mr. Blorage, "spoke of a nomination—no, by-the-by, she didn't—it was a china bowl—dear me, what do I mean?—I think I hardly know what I do mean!"

"You look rather wild, Dick; of course I can't help you out. I don't know what you discoursed upon in your walk; but there appears to me no affinity between a nomination for the Blue-coat School and a china bowl."

"Oh! that's what she wants, is it? Blue-coat School! God bless my soul! Really a nomination, eh? Blue coat! Ah!—Check to your queen!"

Notwithstanding that check Dick lost the game. But he went home in a felicitous state of mind that made him feel as if he had won the game. He continued to repeat the word "Blue" to himself, as if he were under an obligation never to forget it. He went up to his bedroom chuckling "Blue;" he undressed chuckling "Blue;" he sat up in bed, after lying down, with a vehement "Blue;" and his last recollection was a struggle to say "Blue-nomicoatation."

VI.

Mr. Blorage arose in a contented and happy frame of mind. The great day was the greatest of successes; nothing marred the triumph of the dinner, nothing marred the beauty of the ball. The hard-faced dowager sat in the chair, but she was just as forcible and disagreeable as usual; no more and no less. Mr. Blorage danced with Lady Fitzcluck, and bespoke Fanny, and Florence, and Gatty; for Gatty was there, demurely happy. Trust Mr. and Mrs. Doctor for Gatty's being there!

Florence looked most beautiful. She was charmingly dressed in white tarlatan—three skirts—pinked—each skirt looped up with a mixture of white roses and pomegranate blossoms. A wreath of the same for her hair. Fanny was dressed in floating robes of blue—less blue than her eyes. Her fair curls were twined with silver leaves: she looked like a nymph; Florence like a queen. Not the greatest gossip in the room could say which was the favorite. Neither could the greatest or the least gossip in the room decide at what particular moment the star of both descended below Mr. Blorage's horizon.

But he has confided to somebody, who confided it to me, who now confide it to you, that Miss Florence ceased to be beautiful in his eyes when she sneered at the plainness of the Miss Blands' muslin dresses. "And it is real ivy in their hair, Mr. Blorage, so they can't have gone to any great expense to do honor to your ball." And Miss Florence glanced down at her own dress.

"I like them all the better for it," stoutly answered Dick.

As to Miss Fanny, she was so astonished at the impertinence of such people as the Blands thrusting themselves into society so much above them! And her star descended at the instant when she was thus overcome.

Mr. Blorage accomplished his dances with Fanny and with Florence, but did not accomplish his dance with Gatty Bland. For on the instant that he claimed her hand Dr. Evans (sent off by his wife presently after dinner) returned from taking care of Mrs. Bland.

"Oh! Mr. Blorage, I must go—thank you so much for the happiest evening I ever spent, and the prettiest sight I ever saw!"

"No no no, you must not go; a quadrille takes only twenty minutes to dance."

"But mamma is alone now, and I should be quite unhappy all that twenty minutes, even though dancing with you. But there is Jenny, she dances so well, and she loves it so much, and —don't think me conceited, Mr. Blorage—she is so pretty."

"She is the prettiest girl in the room—but one," says Mr. Blorage in a whisper. And as he assists Gatty to put on her cloak he sees her, with unspeakable admiration, tie her little laced handkerchief over her head and under her chin, and look so indescribably like the dear darling little creature of his vision that he longs—infamous as is (of course) the thought—to clasp her, then and there, to his heart! But instead of doing so he flies back to the ball-room and engages Jenny out of hand. Thus Gatty, when she went home, was able to tell her mother that she took a last peep at the beautiful scene, and saw kind Mr. Blorage asking Jenny to dance, and Jenny looking as pretty as even those two lovely cousins Florence and Fanny. "They say Mr. Blorage is to marry one of them, mamma, but I hope not."

"Oh, my Gatty!"

"Well, mamma, you know I see a good deal of them here and there, and I am sure they are only pretty girls. They do not appreciate his great noble generous heart. But now, mamma, to bed you must go. No more excitement for you to-night."

Happily the excitement in the little family lasted a good many days, and afforded food for conversation morning, noon, and night. Indeed it was yet as fresh as ever when, one morning, the post brought a piece of news that fairly surpassed the house-warming—a nomination to the Blue-coat School in favor of no less a personage than Master Albert Bland. The commotion in that cottage—Well! It's a blessed thing to want something, for then you can duly appreciate the favor of having it. And it is a blessed thing to be rich, and liberal withal, for then you can bestow the favor so appreciated. Meantime Mr. Blorage divided his time pretty equally between his little office at the Bank, Dr. Evans's, the house belonging to the father of Florence, and the abode within which dwelt the lovely Fanny's aunt. And all these visits, combined with the still existing effects of his dream, ended in consequences.

The first consequence occurred to the self-satisfied William. His slow brother Dick acquired the ridiculous habit of demanding what Bill did with those sums of money he was forever borrowing? And—unkindest thing of all—Mr. Richard insinuated, nay, he more than insinuated, he plainly told Mr. William Blorage that he expected such sums to be repaid in future. And to show that this was no idle threat, he produced a ledger, wherein a debtor and creditor account was drawn up between Mr. Richard Blorage and Mr. William Blorage: which account displayed a state of account so alarming to Mr. William that he reformed rather. Imagine Mr. Dick's pleasure when William, Billy, or Bill applied in sober seriousness for that post of junior of all the junior clerks, whilom so despised by him!

Second important consequence. Mr. Richard Blorage committed a piece of extravagance. He caused to be executed for himself a statuette in white marble. Any orderers of statues, or other things to be made after a fashion of their own, may calculate what an enormous sum Mr. Blorage paid for his statue. It must be ethereal-looking (he said), it must have extended wings, it must be lightly poised on one foot; but, above all, it must have a slightly turned-up nose, and a little lace hankerchief tied under the chin!

* * * * * * *

These consequences came to pass ten years ago. On the night of the thirty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, let us take a peep into Mr. Blorage's house. Let us take a peep at Mr. Blorage in his dining-room. Dinner is over, wine and dessert are on table. The Chair is at the upper end of the room; above the chair is a lovely statuette on a carved oaken bracket.

Dick is reading the paper; so, at the same time, is some one else. Dick holds the paper in his right hand; his left hand clasps a little tiny hand of the said some one else: while the matcher to that small hand of the same some one else turns the leaves of the paper, so that Dick feels he has no want of another hand. If the owner of the small hand gets to the bottom of the page first—which she invariably does, being a woman—she lays her head confidingly on Dick's shoulder, and seems very well content to let it stay there as long as Dick chooses.

"But, hark! There is a noise overhead; a baize door closes with a muffled sound; there is a pattering of little feet, and there is a joyful chorus of little voices. Dick puts down the paper; his companion, flying to the door, opens it; in rush half a dozen small rosy boys and girls. (Most of these little children have noses of a slightly astronomical turn.)

Mamma prepares their dessert. There is a chair wanting at the table. In default of the missing chair, mamma wheels forward the Chair, and sits down in it.

"Papa, papa! Mamma is in the Chair of Truth," cries a child.

Clearly Mr. Blorage must have told his dream in the family circle.

"Then let us question her," says papa. "Mamma, are you happy?"

"Happy, as angels are said to be."

"Do you love us?"

"As (under God) my chief good, my life."

"Have you ever repented marrying Dick Blorage?"

This time the question is only answered by the surcharged eyes; expressive and loving eyes are often more ready to overflow from perfect happiness than from distress or pain.

HIS WONDERFUL END.

It will have been, 'ere now, perceived that I sold the foregoing writings. From the fact of their being printed in these pages, the inference will, 'ere now, have been drawn by the reader (may I add the gentle reader?) that I sold them to One who never yet—*

Having parted with the writings on most satisfactory terms—for in opening negotiations with the present Journal was I not placing myself in the hands of One of whom it may be said, in the words of Another—† I resumed my usual functions. But I too soon discovered that peace of mind had fled from a brow which, up to that time, Time had merely took the hair off, leaving an unruffled expanse within.

It were superfluous to veil it—the brow to which I allude is my own.

Yes, over that brow uneasiness gathered like the sable wing of the fabled bird, as—as no doubt will be easily identified by all right-minded individuals. If not, I am unable, on the spur of the moment, to enter into particulars of him. The reflection that the writings must now inevitably get into print, and that He might yet live and meet with them, sat like the Hag of Night upon my jaded form. The elasticity of my spirits departed. Fruitless was the Bottle, whether Wine or Medicine. I had recourse to both, and the effect of both upon my system was witheringly lowering.

In this state of depression, into which I subsided when I first began to revolve what could I ever say if He—the unknown—was to appear in the Coffee Room and demand reparation, I one forenoon in this last November received a turn that appeared to be given me by the finger of Fate and Conscience, hand in hand. I was alone in the Coffee Room and had just poked the fire into a blaze, and was standing with my back to it, trying whether heat would penetrate with soothing influence to the Voice within, when a young man in a cap, of an intelligent countenance though requiring his hair cut, stood before me.

"Mr. Christopher, the Head Waiter."

"The same."

The young man shook his hair out of his vision—which it impeded—took a packet from his breast, and handing it over to me, said, with his eye (or did I dream?) fixed with a lambent meaning on me, "THE PROOFS."

Although I smelt my coat-tails singeing at the fire, I had not the power to withdraw them. The young man put the packet in my faltering grasp, and repeated—let me do him the justice to add, with civility:

"THE PROOFS. A. Y. R."

With these words he departed.

A. Y. R.? And You Remember. Was that his meaning? At Your Risk. Were the letters short for that reminder? Anticipate Your Retribution. Did they stand for that warning? Outdacious Youth Repent? But no; for that, a O was happily wanting, and the vowel here was a A.

I opened the packet and found that its contents were the foregoing writings printed, just as the reader (may I add the discerning reader?) peruses them. In vain was the reassuring whisper—A. Y. R., All the Year Round—it could not cancel the Proofs. Too appropriate name. The Proofs of my having sold the Writings.

My wretchedness daily increased. I had not thought of the risk I ran, and the defying publicity I put my head into, until all was done, and all was in print. Give up the money to be off the bargain, and prevent the publication, I could not. My family was down in the world, Christmas was coming on, a brother in the hospital and a sister in the rheumatics could not be entirely neglected. And it was not only ins in the family that had told on the resources of one unaided Waitering; outs were not wanting. A brother out of a situation, and another brother out of money to meet an acceptance, and another brother out of his mind, and another brother out at New York (not the same, though it might appear so), had really and truly brought me to a stand till I could turn myself round. I got worse and worse in my meditations, constantly reflecting "The Proofs," and reflecting that when Christmas drew nearer, and the Proofs were published, there could be no safety from hour to hour but that He might confront me in the Coffee Room, and in the face of day and his country demand his rights.

The impressive and unlooked-for catastrophe toward which I dimly pointed the reader (shall I add, the highly intellectual reader?) in my first remarks, now rapidly approaches.

It was November still, but the last echoes of the Guy-Foxes had long ceased to reverberate. We was slack—several joints under our average mark, and wine of course proportionate. So slack had we become at last, that Beds Nos. 26, 27, 28, and 31 having took their six o'clock dinners and dozed over their respective pints, had drove away in their respective Hansoms for their respective Night Mail-Trains, and left us empty.

I had took the evening paper to No. 6 table—which is warm and most to be preferred—and lost in the all-absorbing topics of the day, had dropped into a slumber. I was recalled to consciousness by the well-known intimation, "Waiter!" and replying "Sir!" found a gentleman standing at No. 4 table. The reader (shall I add, the observant reader?) will please to notice the locality of the gentleman—at No. 4 table.

He had one of the new-fangled uncollapsable bags in his hand (which I am against, for I don't see why you shouldn't collapse, when you are about it, as your fathers collapsed before you), and he said:

"I want to dine, waiter. I shall sleep here to-night."

"Very good, Sir. What will you take for dinner, Sir?"

"Soup, bit of codfish, oyster sauce, and the joint."

"Thank you, Sir."

I rang the chamber-maid's bell, and Mrs. Pratchett marched in, according to custom, demurely carrying a lighted flat candle before her, as if she was one of a long public procession, all the other members of which was invisible.

In the mean while the gentleman had gone up to the mantle-piece, right in front of the fire, and laid his forehead against the mantle-piece (which it is a low one, and brought him into the attitude of leap-frog), and had heaved a tremenjous sigh. His hair was long and lightish; and when he laid his forehead against the mantle-piece his hair all fell in a dusty fluff together over his eyes; and when he now turned round and lifted up his head again, it all fell in a dusty fluff together over his ears. This give him a wild appearance, similar to a blasted heath.

"Oh! The chamber-maid. Ah!" He was turning something in his mind. "To be sure. Yes. I won't go up stairs now, if you will take my bag. It will be enough for the present to know my number.—Can you give me 24 B?"

(O Conscience, what a Adder art thou!)

Mrs. Pratchett allotted him the room, and took his bag to it. He then went back before the fire, and fell a biting his nails.

"Waiter!" biting between the words, "give me," bite, "pen and paper; and in five minutes," bite, "let me have, if you please," bite, "a," bite, "Messenger."

Unmindful of his waning soup, he wrote and sent off six notes before he touched his dinner. Three were City; three West-End. The City letters were to Cornhill, Ludgate-hill, and Farringdon Street. The West-End letters were to Great Marlborough Street, New Burlington Street, and Piccadilly. Every body was systematically denied at every one of the six places, and there was not a vestige of any answer. Our light porter whispered to me when he came back with that report, "All Booksellers."

But before then he had cleared off his dinner and his bottle of wine. He now—mark the concurrence with the document formerly given in full!—knocked a plate of biscuits off the table with his agitated elber (but without breakage), and demanded boiling brandy-and-water.

Now fully convinced that it was Himself, I perspired with the utmost freedom. When he become flushed with the heated stimulant referred to, he again demanded pen and paper, and passed the succeeding two hours in producing a manuscript, which he put in the fire when completed. He then went up to bed, attended by Mrs. Pratchett. Mrs. Pratchett (who was aware of my emotions) told me on coming down that she had noticed his eye rolling into every corner of the passages and staircase, as if in search of his Luggage, and that, looking back as she shut the door of 24 B, she perceived him with his coat already thrown off immersing himself bodily under the bedstead, like a chimley-sweep before the application of machinery.

The next day—I forbear the horrors of that night—was a very foggy day in our part of London, insomuch that it was necessary to light the Coffee Room gas. We was still alone, and no feverish words of mine can do justice to the fitfulness of his appearance as he sat at No. 4 table, increased by there being something wrong with the meter.

Having again ordered his dinner he went out, and was out for the best part of two hours. Inquiring on his return whether any of the answers had arrived, and receiving an unqualified negative, his instant call was for mulligatawny, the cayenne pepper, and orange brandy.

Feeling that the mortal struggle was now at hand, I also felt that I must be equal to him, and with that view resolved that whatever he took I would take. Behind my partition, but keeping my eye on him over the curtain, I therefore operated on Mulligatawny, Cayenne Pepper, and Orange Brandy. And at a later period of the day, when he again said "Orange Brandy," I said so too, in a lower tone, to George, my Second Lieutenant (my First was absent on leave), who acts between me and the bar.

Throughout that awful day he walked about the Coffee Room continually. Often he came close up to my partition, and then his eye rolled within, too evidently in search of any signs of his Luggage. Half past six came, and I laid his cloth. He ordered a bottle of old Brown. I likewise ordered a bottle of old Brown. He drank his, I drank mine (as nearly as my duties would permit), glass for glass against his. He topped with coffee and a small glass. I topped with coffee and a small glass. He dozed. I dozed. At last, "Waiter!"—and he ordered his bill. The moment was now at hand when we two must be locked in the deadly grapple.

Swift as the arrow from the bow I had formed my resolution: in other words, I had hammered it out between nine and nine. It was, that I would be the first to open up the subject with a full acknowledgment, and would offer any gradual settlement within my power. He paid his bill (doing what was right by attendance) with his eye rolling about him to the last, for any tokens of his Luggage. One only time our gaze then met, with the lustrous fixedness (I believe I am correct in imputing that character to it?) of the well-known Basilisk. The decisive moment had arrived.

With a tolerable steady hand, though with humility, I laid The Proofs before him.

"Gracious Heavens!" he cries out, leaping up and catching hold of his hair. "What's this! Print!"

"Sir," I replied, in a calming voice, and bending forward, "I humbly acknowledge to being the unfortunate cause of it. But I hope, Sir, that when you have heard the circumstances explained, and the innocence of my intentions—"

To my amazement I was stopped short by his catching me in both his arms, and pressing me to his breast-bone; where I must confess to my face (and particular nose) having undergone some temporary vexation from his wearing his coat buttoned high up, and his buttons being uncommon hard.

"Ha, ha, ha!" he cries, releasing me with a wild laugh, and grasping my hand. "What is your name, my Benefactor?"

"My name, Sir" (I was crumpled, and puzzled to make him out), "is Christopher: and I hope, Sir, that as such when you've heard my ex—"

"In print!" he exclaims again, dashing the proofs over and over as if he was bathing in them. "In print!! Oh, Christopher! Philanthropist! Nothing can recompense you—but what sum of money would be acceptable to you?"

I had drawn a step back from him, or I should have suffered from his buttons again.

"Sir, I assure you I have been already well paid, and—"

"No, no, Christopher! Don't talk like that! What sum of money would be acceptable to you, Christopher? Would you find twenty pounds acceptable, Christopher?"

However great my surprise, I naturally found words to say, "Sir, I am not aware that the man was ever yet born without more than the average amount of water on the brain, as would not find twenty pound acceptable. But—extremely obliged to you, Sir, I'm sure;" for he had tumbled it out of his purse and crammed it in my hand in two bank-notes; "but I could wish to know, Sir, if not intruding, how I have merited this liberality?"

"Know then, my Christopher," he says, "that from boyhood's hour I have unremittingly and unavailingly endeavored to get into print. Know, Christopher, that all the Booksellers alive—and several dead—have refused to put me into print. Know, Christopher, that I have written unprinted Reams. But they shall be read to you, my friend and brother. You sometimes have a holiday?"

Seeing the great danger I was in, I had the presence of mind to answer, "Never!" To make it more final, I added, "Never! Not from the cradle to the grave."

"Well," says he, thinking no more about that, and chuckling at his proofs again. "But I am in print! The first flight of ambition emanating from my father's lowly cot is realized at length! The golden bowl!"—he was getting on—"struck by the magic hand, has emitted a complete and perfect sound! When did this happen, my Christopher?"

"Which happen, Sir?"

"This," he held it out at arm's-length to admire it, "this Per-rint."

When I had given him my detailed account of it, he grasped me by the hand again, and said:

"Dear Christopher, it should be gratifying to you to know that you are an instrument in the hands of Destiny. Because you are."

A passing Something of a melancholy cast put it into my head to shake it, and to say: "Perhaps we all are."

"I don't mean that," he answered; "I don't take that wide range; I confine myself to the special case. Observe me well, my Christopher! Hopeless of getting rid, through any effort of my own, of any of the manuscripts among my Luggage—all of which, send them where I would, were always coming back to me—it is now some seven years since I left that Luggage here, on the desperate chance, either that the too too faithful manuscripts would come back to me no more, or that some one less accursed than I might give them to the world. You follow me, my Christopher?"

"Pretty well, Sir." I followed him so far as to judge that he had a weak head, and that the Orange the Boiling and Old Brown combined was beginning to tell. (The old Brown being heady is best adapted to seasoned cases.)

"Years elapsed, and those compositions slumbered in dust. At length Destiny, choosing her agent from all mankind, sent You here, Christopher, and lo! the Casket was burst asunder, and the Giant was free!"

He made hay of his hair after he said this, and he stood a tip-toe.

"But," he reminded himself in a state of great excitement, "we must sit up all night, my Christopher. I must correct these Proofs for the press. Fill all the inkstands and bring me several new pens."

He smeared himself and he smeared the Proofs, the night through, to that degree, that when Sol give him warning to depart (in a four-wheeler), few could have said which was them, and which was him, and which was blots. His last instructions was, that I should instantly run and take his corrections to the office of the present Journal. I did so. They most likely will not appear in print, for I noticed a message being brought round from Beaufort Printing House while I was a throwing this concluding statement on paper, that the ole resources of that establishment was unable to make out what they meant. Upon which a certain gentleman in company, as I will not more particularly name—but of whom it will be sufficient to remark, standing on the broad basis of a wave-girt isle, that whether we regard him in the light of—* laughed, and put the corrections in the fire.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF FREDERICKSBURG.

WE illustrate this memorable event, which took place on Thursday, December 11, on pages 817 and 820. The following extracts from the correspondence of the Herald and Times will serve to explain our pictures. The Herald writer, on 11th, says:

THE BOMBARDMENT.

Last evening, at sundown, the movement commenced. Batteries hastened to the front, wagon trains were removed from the vicinity of the anticipated battle, the ponderous pontoons joined the current hurrying riverward, and night closed down upon us bright and beautiful, with our pulses throbbing quick with eager expectations. Artillery never seemed to rumble so noisily before, and the sharp cluck of the iron axles echoed far and near, as if in league with the enemy. Down by the river every thing was as quiet as peace. Our pickets, composed of the Fifty-first Pennsylvania regiment, sat listlessly about their fires, watching the rebel sentries and crunching hard tack. The river swept smoothly by, placid as the sky above, and just over there, so close one almost wished to tell them of their error, stood the rebel sentries, while a soothing movement of rushing waters in the rapids up stream swelled softly down the valley. From the thresholds of the city the sharp yelp of curs rang now and then discordantly upon the ear; but with the batteries in position the cause of their outcry would be removed, and silence again settle down upon the town, broken only by the tones of the town-clock telling the midnight hours. And so the time slipped along. The moon climbed higher up, and the falling dew whitened into frost upon our pouches, while the horses, restless in the chill night air, moved to and fro uneasily in their harness.

At two o'clock our pickets were withdrawn, and at three the pontoon train drove down to the water. Lumber was noiselessly piled upon the ground, and the huge boats slid from off their trucks. Then we hear a splashing in the river—a dark pathway lengthens out upon the silver surface, shadows flit here and there along its track, the lusty blows of hammers re-echo from side to side. And yet no sound comes from the enemy. "Have they evacuated the place?" "Are we not to fight here after all?" is asked. Suddenly, Crack! crack! crack! from a hundred muskets tells us the ball is opened. A cry of pain comes up the bank from the gallant engineers, mules dash off, with pontoons thundering after, across the plot; the musketry grows louder and the whiz of bullets more frequent; frightened teamsters fly, panic-stricken, and the artillery horses plunge at the caissons. Suddenly, boom! goes a gun—another and another, until thirty pieces are pouring shot and shell upon the devoted city. Graham, who did so gloriously at Antietam; Kirby, with Ricketts's old Bull Run battery; Miller, Durell, Tyler, Smith, Hazard, Kinsey, and Dickson, all join in the uproar, and musketry is lost to the ear in the mighty roar that re-echoes again and again from hill to hill. Gradually the fire slackens, and the engineers again attempt the completion of the bridge, but in vain; and after a third trial they fall back, bearing in their arms their wounded, dead, and dying.

It was designed to lay down two bridges at once, one at the lower and the other at the upper end of the city. The enemy, posted in the houses and cellars, upon the bank of the river, were safe from our infantry, and maintained a continuous fire. Our infantry returned the fire spiritedly, but finding it impossible to drive the rebels from their cover, finally withdrew, leaving the disposition of the enemy to our artillery.

By this time it was sunrise. The engineers (Fiftieth New York) and the Fifty-seventh and Sixty-sixth New York regiments had suffered heavily, and the wounded

Combining all the requisites for accurate, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has stems and set complete with the machinery to own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. In case of this Watch, after the expiration of two months, the outer one being fine 14-carat gold, it has the improved key motion, key movements, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Price, superbly engraved, as per sketch, $20. Sent by express, C.O.D., or by mail, in neat morocco boxes, for those proceeding to buy at Wholesale, $18 per dozen, with bill payable on delivery. Soldiers must remit payment in advance, as we can not collect from them. Address

Hints to Company Officers
ON THE Military Duties.
By CAPT. C. C. ANDREWS,
Of the 72d Highlanders, N. Y. S. M.
The principal portion of this work was written while the author was employed as a prisoner of war in the hands of Georgia, and contains, in a small compass, a large amount of information useful to Company Officers which can be found in the "Regulations." An officer can not fail to be better qualified for a command after a careful perusal of its pages.

HEINSTREET'S
Inimitable Hair Restorative.
IT IS NOT A DYE.

But restores gray hair to its original color, by supplying the capillary vessels with natural nourishment, and making it glossy. All unfortunate dyes are composed of substances destroying the vitality and beauty of the hair, and afford of themselves no dressing. Heinstreet's Inimitable Restorative not only restores the hair to its natural color by an easy process, but gives the hair a Luxuriant Beauty,
promotes its growth, prevents its falling off, eradicates dandruff, and imparts health and pleasantness to the head. It has stood the test of time, being the original Life Restoring, and is constantly increasing in favor. Used by both gentlemen and ladies. Price $1 per bottle. Sold by druggists generally, and by the proprietor, corner of Grand and Orchard Sts., Jersey City. Depot, 25 Broadway, N.Y. Two sizes, 50 c. and $1.
